spēnd, *spende, v. t. & i. [A. S. spendan (in the compounds ā-spendan and for-spendan), from Low Lat. dispendeo=to spend, waste, consume; Italian spendere=to spend; spendio=expense; Old French despendre.]

A. Transitive:

1. To lay out, to expend; to part with.

"Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread?"—Isaiah lv. 2.

2. To consume, to waste, to exhaust, to squander.

3. To exhaust or drain of force or strength; to waste; to wear away.

"The Trojans, worn with toils, and spent with woes." Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, i. 243.

*4. To utter, to speak; to give out, to declare.

"I will but spend one word here in the house." Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, i. 2.

5. To pass, as time; to suffer to pass away.

"They spend their days in wealth."—Job xxi. 13.

B. Intransitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To expend money; to make disposition of money; to incur expense.

"Every man will be thy friend Whilst thou hast wherewith to spend." Shakesp.: Passionate Pilgrim, 408.

*2. To be lost, wasted, dissipated, or consumed; to vanish, to dissipate, to spread.

II. Min.: To break ground; to make away.

¶ To spend is to deprive in a less degree than to exhaust, and that in a less degree than to drain; everyone who exerts himself in any degree spends his strength; if the exertions are violent he exhausts himself; a country which is drained of men is supposed to have no more left. To spend may be applied to that which is external or inherent in a body; exhaust to that which is inherent; drain to that which is external to the body in which it is contained: we may speak of spending our wealth, our resources, our time, and the like; but of exhausting our strength, our vigor, our voice, and the like; of draining, in the proper application, a vessel of its liquid, or in the improper application, draining a treasury of its contents; hence arises this farther distinction, that to spend and to exhaust may tend, more or less, to the injury of a body; but to drain may be to its advantage. To spend implies simply to turn to some purpose or to make use of; to expend carries with it likewise the idea of exhausting; to dissipate signifies to expend in waste, to squander. (Crabb.)

¶ To spend a mast:

Naut.: To break or carry away a mast in foul weather.

*spend-all, s. A spendthrift.

*spēnd'-a-ble, a. [Eng. spend; -able.] Capable of being spent; available for expenditure.

"The whole pressure caused by the movement and depression of the north wall, as evidenced by the crushing at the spendrell and the scaling off of the brickwork."—London Daily Telegraph.

spēnd'-thrif, a. & s. [Eng. spend and thrift.]

A. As adj.: Prodigal, wasteful, improvident.

"Straight from the filth of this low grub, behold Comes fluttering forth a gaudy spendthrift heir." Thomson: Castle of Indolence, ii. 51.

B. As subst.: One who spends his means lavishly or wastefully; an improvident person; a prodigal.

"What would he have cost our prodigal spendthrifts, if he had been taken upon our coasts near Rome?"—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. ix., ch. xviii.

*spēnd'-thrif-ŷ, a. [English spendthrift; -ŷ.] Spendthrift, prodigal.

"Spendthrifts, unclean, and ruffian-like courses."—Rogers: Naaman the Syrian, p. 611.

Spēn'-sēr'-i-an, a. [See def.] Of or relating to the poet Spenser (1552-1599). Specifically applied to the style of versification adopted by him in his Faerie Queene, and followed by Byron in his Childe Harold. It consists of a strophe of eight decasyllabic lines, and an Alexandrine, and has a threefold rhyme; the first and third lines forming one, the second, fourth, fifth, and seventh another, and the sixth, eighth, and ninth the third.

"In short, it is to be feared that Lord Carnarvon's Odyssey can never supersede Worsley's, in Spenserian stanzas, nor Avia's, though it is a very close and studious performance."—London Daily News.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or. wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

spermato-cystidium (pl. spermato-cystidia), subst.

Botany: Hedwig's name for the supposed male organs in the Muscales. [ANTHERIDIUM.]

spēr-māt'-ō-blast, s. [Prefix spermato-, and Gr. blastos.]

Biology: A daughter-cell in the seminal duct giving origin to a spermatozoön (q. v.).

spēr-māt'-ō-çele, s. [Pref. spermato-, and Gr. kēlē=a tumor.]

Pathol.: A morbid distension of the epididymis and vas deferens.

spēr-ma-tō-gēn'-ē-sis, s. [Prefix spermato-, and Eng. genesis.]

Physiol.: The origin of spermatozooids in the semiferous canals.

"He (Prof. Grünhagen) had attained the same results on spermatogenesis as had Dr. Biondi, to whom, of the two independent discoverers, was due the title of priority."—Nature, Oct. 1, 1885, p. 544.

spēr-ma-tō-gē-nēt'-ic, adj. [Prefix spermato-, and Eng. genetic.] Of or pertaining to spermatogenesis (q. v.). (Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xx. 412.)

spēr-ma-tōg'-ēn-ous, a. [Prefix spermato-, and Lat. gigno, pa. t. genui=to produce.] Producing sperm.

spēr-ma-tōid, adj. [SPERMAT-] Sperm-like; resembling seed or sperm.

spēr-ma-tōl'-ō-gy, s. [Pref. spermato-, and Gr. logos=a discourse.] Scientific facts or theories concerning sperm.

spēr-ma-to-ōn (pl. spēr-ma-tō-a), s. [Prefix spermato-, and Gr. ōon=an egg.]

Biol.: A cell which stands in the relation of a nucleus to a sperm-cell, and of a developmental cell to the spermatozoa. (Brande & Cox.)

spēr-māt'-ō-phore, s. [Prefix spermato-, and Gr. phoros=bearing.]

Biol. (pl.): Capsules or sheaths containing fertilizing elements. Used chiefly of the cylindrical capsules secreted by the prostatic gland of male Cephalopods. When moistened, the spermato-phores expand and burst, expelling the contents with considerable force.

spēr-ma-tōph'-ōr-ous, a. [SPERMATOPHORE.] Bearing or producing sperm or seed; seminiferous.

spēr-ma-tōr-rhœ'-a, s. [Prefix spermato-, and Gr. rheō=to flow.]

Pathol.: A real or apparent discharge of seminal fluid, without voluntary sexual excitement. It is of two kinds: (1) True, in which discharges of spermatozoa occurs; (2) False, or prostatorrhœa, in which a fluid clearer and more tenacious than the seminal fluid, and destitute of spermatozoa, is discharged.

spēr-ma-tō-zō'-ic, a. [Eng. spermatozo(a); -ic.] Belonging to or resembling spermatozoa (q. v.). (Draper: Human Physiol., p. 518.)

†spēr-ma-tō-zō'-id, s. [Mod. Lat. spermatozo(on), and Gr. eidōs=form, resemblance. (See def.)]

Biol.: Von Siebold's name for a spermatozoön (q. v.). Duglison (ed. 1874) says: "More properly, spermatozoid, for their animalcular nature is not demonstrated." The name is also applied to antherozooids. [ANTHEROZOÖID.]

spēr-ma-tō-zō'-ōn (pl. spēr-ma-tō-zō'-a), s. [Pref. spermato-, and Gr. zōon=an animal.]

Biology (pl.): The name given by Leeuwenhoek to the moving, active constituents of the seminal fluid, which were brought to his notice by his pupil Hamm, in 1677. Spermatozoa consist of a head, a rod-shaped middle piece, and a long hair-like tail, by the vibratile motion of which they move in a spiral manner. Cold arrests their movements, and they may be deprived of vitality (the power of fecundation) in various ways. They were at first regarded as parasites, and classified as Helminthes or Infusoria, and Von Baer maintained this view as late as 1835. Von Siebold discovered them in many vertebrates, but Kölliker was the first to recognize them as definite histological elements arising within the testes. [SPERMATOZOÏD.]

spēr-mic, a. [Eng. sperm; -ic.] Of or pertaining to sperm or seed.

†spēr-mid'-i-um, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. sperma=seed.]

Bot.: An achene (q. v.).

spēr-mō, pref. [SPERMAT-] spēr-mō-dērm, s. [Prefix spermo-, and Gr. derma=the skin.]

Bot.: The skin or testa of a seed. (De Candolle.)

spēr-mō-gō-ni-a, s. pl. [Prefix sperma-, and Gr. goneuō=to beget.]

Bot.: The cysts containing spermatia in lichens. (Tulasne.)

spēr-mōl'-ō-gist, s. [Eng. spermolog(y); -ist.] One who treats of sperm or seeds; one who studies spermatology (q. v.).

spēr-rōl'-ō-gy, s. [Eng. sperm; suff. -ology.] That branch of science which deals with sperm or seeds; a treatise on sperm or seeds.

spēr-mō-phile, s. [SPERMOPHILUS.]

Zoöl.: Any individual of the genus Spermophilus (q. v.). They are squirrel-like in form, with rather short tails.

"The labor of the moles is supplemented by that of the gophers, spermophiles, and badgers."—Field, Dec. 26, 1885.

spēr-mōph'-il-ūs, s. [Pref. spermo-, and Greek philō=to love.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: Pouched Marmots, a genus of Sciuridæ, sub-family Arctomyiæ, with twenty-six species, confined to the Nearctic and Palearctic regions. Cheek pouches large; pollex rudimentary or absent. They appear first in the European Miocene, and connect the Squirrels with the Marmots. [SISEL, SPERMOPHILE.]

spēr-mō-phōre, spēr-mōph'-ōr-um, s. [Greek spermophoros=bearing seeds: sperma=seed, and phoros=bearing.]

Botany:

1. A cord bearing the seeds in some plants.

2. The placenta.

spēr-mō-thē'-ca, s. [Prefix spermo-; Lat. theca, and Gr. thēkē=a case, a box.]

Bot.: A seed-vessel.

spērr, v. t. [SPAR (1), v.]

spērse, v. t. [Lat. sparsus, pa. par. of spargo=to scatter.] To disperse, to scatter.

"Broke his sword in twaine, and all his armor spērr."—Spenser: F. Q., V. iii. 3.

spērtē, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Bot.: A variety of Salix viminalis. (Britten & Holland.)

spērtē, s. [SPARTHE.] A battle-ax.

"At his saddle-gerthe was a good steel spērtē, Full ten pound weight and more."—Scott: Eve of St. John.

spēr-vēr, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

*1. Arch.: An old name for the wooden frame at the top of a bed or canopy. (Sometimes the term included the tester or headpiece.)

2. Her.: A tent.

spēss'-art-ine, spēss'-art-ite, s. [After Spessart, Bavaria, where first found; suff. -ine, -ite (Min.); Ger. spessartit.]

Min.: A variety of Garnet (q. v.) containing a large percentage of protoxide of manganese. Dana makes this a special subdivision of the Garnet group. Color, dark hyacinth-red with shades of violet. Found (among a few other localities) in large crystals at Haddam, Connecticut.

spēt, v. t. [SPIT, v.]

spēt, s. [SPET, v.] Spittle.

spētch'-ēs, s. pl. [Etym. doubtful.] The trimmings or offal of skins or hides, used for making glue.

spēt'-tle, s. [SPITTLE.] (Baret.)

spē-tūm, s. [Low Lat.]

Old Arm.: A kind of spear used in the fifteenth century. It differed from the partizan only in being lighter and of narrower form. (See illustration under Spear.)

spew (ew as ū), spue, spewe, v. t. & i. [A. S. spūan (pa. t. spāw), pa. par. spūwen; cogn. with Dut. spuuen; Icel. spýja; Dan. spyje; Sw. spy; O. H. Ger. spiwan; Ger. speien; Goth. speiwan; Lat. spuo; Gr. ptuō. From the same root come spit and puke.]

A. Transitive:

1. To vomit, to puke, to eject from the stomach.

"Therewith she spewed out of her filthie maw

A flood of poyson horrible and blacke."—Spenser: F. Q., I. i. 20.

2. To eject, to cast forth.

"When earth with slime and mud is cover'd o'er, Or hollow places spew their wat'ry store."—Dryden: Virgil; Georgic i, 176.

3. To eject or cast out with loathing or abhorrence.

"Keep my statutes, and commit not any of these abominations, that the land spew you not out."—Leviticus xviii. 28.

B. Intrans.: To vomit; to discharge the contents of the stomach.

"If thou hast founden hony, etc of it that sufficeth; for if thou etc of it out of mesure, thou shalt spew, and be nedy and poure."—Chaucer: Tale of Melibeus.

spew (ew as ū), spue, subst. [SPEW, v.] Vomit; that which is ejected from the stomach.

spew'-ēr, spū'-ēr (ew as ū), s. [Eng. spew; -er.] One who spews or vomits.

spew'-i-nēss (ew as ū), s. [Eng. spewy; -ness.] The quality or state of being spewy; wetness, damp.

"The coldness and spewiness of the soil."—Gauden.

spew'-y (ew as ū), a. [Eng. spew; -y.] Wet, damp, boggy.

"The lower vallies in wet winters are so spewy, that they know not how to feed them."—Mortimer: Husbandry.

spḥāç'-ēl, s. [SPHACELUS.] Gangrene.

spḥāç'-ē-lār'-i-a, subst. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. sphacelus (q. v.).] Named from the gangrene-looking fructification.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Sphacelariidæ. Jointed, rigid, distichously-branched, feathery, filamentous fronds, of olive color, with an expanded terminal cell, containing a granular mass.

spḥāç'-ē-lār'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin sphacelar(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Fucaceæ, tribe Halysereæ. [SPHACELARIA.]

spḥāç'-ēl-āte, v. i. & t. [SPHACEL.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To become gangrenous, as flesh; to mortify.

"The skin, by the great distention, having been rendered very thin, will, if not taken away, sphacelate, and the rest degenerate into a cancerous ulcer."—Sharp: Surgery.

2. To decay or become carious, as a bone.

B. Trans.: To affect with gangrene.

"The long retention of matter sphacelates the brain."—Sharp: Surgery.

spḥāç'-ēl-āte, spḥāç'-ēl-āt-ēd, a. [SPHACELATE, v.]

Bot.: Decayed, withered, dead.

spḥāç'-ēl-ā-tion, subst. [SPHACELATE, v.] The process of becoming or making gangrenous; mortification.

spḥāç'-ēl-i-sm, spḥāç'-ēl-i-s'-mūs, s. [SPHACELUS.] A gangrene; an inflammation of the brain.

spḥāç'-ē-lūs, s. [Gr. sphakelos, from sphazō=to kill; Fr. sphacèle.]

Medical and Surgical:

1. Gangrene; mortification of the flesh of a living animal.

2. Death or caries of a bone.

sphær-, sphær-ō- (ær as ër), prefix. [Greek sphaira=a ball, a sphere.] Pertaining to or resembling a ball or sphere.

sphær-āl-çē'-a (ær as ër), s. [Prefix sphær-, and Gr. alkea=a kind of wild mallow.]

Bot.: A genus of Malvæ. Trees or shrubs, with toothed or three to five-lobed leaves, a three-leaved deciduous involucre, a five-cleft calyx, five petals. Chiefly from South America. A decoction of Sphær-alcea cispalina is given in Brazil in inflammation of the bowels.

sphær-ān'-thē-æ (ær as ër), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sphæranthus; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of Asteroideæ.

sphær-ān'-thūs (ær as ër), s. [Prefix sphær-, and Gr. anthos=a flower.]

Botany: The typical genus of Sphæranthæ. Sphæranthus indicus (or mollis), a composite plant with globular heads of purple flowers, common in India in rice fields, is considered anthelmintic, alterative, depuratory, cooling and tonic, and diuretic. The powder of the root is said to be stomachic, and the bark ground and mixed with whey a remedy for piles. (Calc. Exhib. Rep.) sphær-ēn'-ch'y-ma (ær as ër), s. [Prefix sphær-, and Gr. enchyma=an infusion.]

Bot.: Merenchyma (q. v.).

sphær-i-a (ær as ër), s. [Gr. sphairion, dimin. from sphaira=a sphere. Named from the globular form of the species.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Sphæriacei (q. v.). Perithecia carbonaceous, completely exposed, partially sunk into the matrix, or covered by the cuticle and accompanied by a growth of threads, constituting the mycelium. Known species about 500. They are found at all seasons on the trunks of trees, on leaves, on fir cones, &c.

sphær-i-ā-çē-i (ær as ër), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sphæri(a); Lat. masc. pl. adj. suff. -acei.]

Bot.: A sub-order of Ascomycetes. They have carbonaceous or membranaceous cysts, or perithecia composed of cells or very rarely of interwoven threads, with a pore or narrow slit at the top, which often ends in a nipple or crest. Lining the cysts is a gelatinous mass of asci and paraphyses (barren threads). Found on decayed wood, stems, algæ, dung, soil, &c. (Berkeley.)

sphær-īd'-i-a, s. pl. [SPHÆRIDIMUM.]

Zoöl.: Stalked appendages with button-like heads covered with cilia, found in most recent sea-urchins. They are supposed to be organs of sense, probably of taste. (Loven.)

bōil, bōy; pōūt, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-clan, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şūn; -tion, -şion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = beł, deł sphaer-īd-ī-i-næ (ær as ër), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sphaeridi(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Entom.: A sub-family of Hydrophilidae, living on the dung of land animals.

sphaer-īd-ī-ūm (ær as ër), s. [Gr. sphaeridion, dimin. from sphaira=a sphere. So named from the spherical shape of the insects.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Sphaeridiinae (q. v.).
sphaer-īs-tēr-ī-ūm (ær as ër), s. [Lat., from Gr. sphairstērion, from sphairstēs=a ball-player; sphaira=a ball, a globe.]

Anc. Arch.: A court for the exercise of ball-playing; a tennis-court.

sphaer-īte (ær as ër), subst. [Latin sphæra=a sphere; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in globular concretions without fibrous or concentric structure. Hardness, 4; specific gravity, 2.536; luster, greasy-vitreous; color, light-gray; translucent. Composition: Phosphoric acid, 26.1; alumina, 47.4; water, 26.5=100, corresponding with the chemical formula $5Al_2O_3, 2PO_5+16HO$. Occurs in fissures in limonite at Žajecov, Bohemia, in Lower Silurian schists.

sphaer-ō-bāc-tē-rī-a, s. pl. [Pref. sphæro, and Eng. bacteria.]

Biology: 1. In Cohn's classification, a genus of unicellular round or oval organisms, stationary, and devoid of cilia or flagella. 2. The Micrococci.

sphaer-ō-blas-tūs (ær as ër), s. [Pref. sphæro, and Gr. blastos=a sprout, a shoot.]

Bot.: A cotyledon which rises above ground, bearing at its end a spheroid tumor.

sphaer-ō-cār-ŷ-a (ær as ër), s. [Pref. sphæro, and Gr. karya=a walnut tree.]

Botany: A genus of Santalaceae. Sphaerocarya edulis is eaten in Nepaul.

sphaer-ō-cō-bālt-īte (ær as ër), subst. [Pref. sphæro, and Eng. cobaltite.]

Min.: A mineral found in small spherical masses, having crystalline structure, with roselite, at Schneeberg, Saxony. Color, externally velvet-black, internally rose-red. Hardness, 4; specific gravity, 4.02-4.13. An analysis yielded: Carbonic acid, 34.65; protoxide of cobalt, 58.86; sesquioxide of iron, 3.41; lime, 1.80; water, 1.22=99.94, which corresponds to the formula $CoCO_3$, which requires, CO_2 , 36.94, CoO , 63.06.

sphaer-o-cōc-qī-tēs (ær as ër), s. [Mod. Lat. sphaerococc(us); suff. -ites.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Algae.

sphaer-ō-cōc-mōld-ē-a, sphaer-ō-cōc-çē-a (ær as ër), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sphaerococc(us), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A sub-order of Ceramiaceae (q. v.) (Lindley), placed under the Rhodospiraeae (Berkeley). Frond cellular, enclosing closely packed, oblong granules arising from the base, within a spherical cellular envelope, which finally bursts. (Lindley.)

sphaer-ō-cōc-cūs (ær as ër), s. [Pref. sphæro, and Lat. coccus=a berry, a kernel.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Sphaerococcoidea (q. v.).

sphaer-ō-dōn (ær as ër), s. [Pref. sphæro, and Gr. odontos=a tooth.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Pagrina (q. v.), with one species from the Indian Ocean.

sphaer-ō-dōn-tī-dæ (ær as ër), s. pl. [SPHÆRODON.]

Palæont.: A family of Ganoid Fishes. Body oblong, with rhombic scales; dorsal and anal fins short (q. v.); vertebrae ossified, but not completely closed; tail homocercal; fins with fulcra; teeth on palate globular.

sphaer-ō-dūs (ær as ër), s. [Pref. sphæro, and odus=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A genus of Pycnodontidae. Sphaerodus gigas is from the Kimmeridge Clay of England and from the Jura Mountains.

sphaer-ō-gās-tra (ær as ër), s. pl. [Pref. sphæro, and Gr. gaster (genit. gastros=) the belly.]

Zoöl.: The same as ARANEIDA (q. v.).

sphaer-ō-mā (ær as ër), s. [Gr. sphairōma= anything round.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Sphaeromidae (q. v.), with several species, which are vegetable feeders, and, like many of their allies, have the power of rolling themselves into a ball.

sphaer-ōm-ī-dæ (ær as ër), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sphaerom(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Natatorial Isopoda, with several genera, in some of which the branchial endopodites are transversely folded, so as to approach those of the Xiphosura (q. v.).

sphaer-ō-nī-tēs (ær as ër), s. [Greek sphairōn (genit. sphairōnos)=a round fishing-net.]

Palæont.: A genus of Cystidae, characterizing the middle division of the Bala or Caradoc rocks.

sphaer-ō-phōr-ī-dæ, sphaer-ō-phō-rā-cē-æ (ær as ër), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sphaeroph(oron); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acææ.]

Botany: A family of Gasterothalamae (q. v.). Apothecia formed in the swollen points of the thallus, bursting irregularly.

sphaer-ōph-ōr-ōn (ær as ër), s. [Pref. sphæro, and Gr. phoreō=to bear.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Sphaerophoridae (q. v.). Sphaerophoron coralloides is not uncommon on sand-rocks among mosses. S. compactum is less common.

sphaer-ō-sī-dēr-īte (ær as ër), sphēr-ō-sī-dēr-īte, s. [Pref. sphæro, and Eng. siderite.]

Min.: A variety of Siderite (q. v.) occurring in globular form with radiating fibrous structure in cavities in basaltic rocks.

sphaer-ō-spōre (ær as ër), s. [Prefix sphæro, and Eng. spore.]

Bot.: The quadruple spore of some Algae.

sphaer-ō-stīl-bīte (ær as ër), s. [Pref. sphæro, and Eng. stilbite.]

Min.: A variety of stilbite sometimes mixed with mesolite, occurring in spheres, mostly minute, having a fibrous radiating structure, with other zeolites in the Isle of Skye.

sphaer-ō-zŷ-ga (ær as ër), s. [Prefix sphæro (q. v.), and Gr. zygon=a yoke.]

Bot.: A synonym of Anabaina (q. v.).

sphaer-u-lār-ī-a (ær as ër), s. [From Latin sphaerula=a little sphere.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Nematode worms, family Gordiidae, founded by Dufour, 1836, on a specimen (Sphaerularia bombi) discovered by him in the abdominal cavities of Bombus terrestris and B. hortorum.

sphaer-ū-lite (ær as ër), s. [SPHERULITE.]

sphāg-nē-ī, sphāg-nā-çē-æ, subst. pl. [Lat. sphagn(um); masc. pl. adj. suff. -ei, or fem. -acææ.]

Bot.: Bog-mosses; an order, tribe, or family of operculate mosses. Proper roots wanting; branches fasciculate; leaves with two kinds of cells—one narrow, elongated, and filled with chlorophyll; the other hyaline. Capsule sessile, globose, in the elongated sheath; at first spores apparently of two kinds, the first in sets of four, the last in sets of sixteen. [SPHAGNUM.]

sphāg-noūs, a. [SPHAGNUM.] Pertaining to, or of the nature of bog-moss; mossy.

sphāg-nūm, s. [Latin sphagnos; Gr. sphagnos, sphagos=(1) sage, (2) a lichen.]

Botany: The only genus of Sphagnei (q. v.). It occurs in all temperate climates. At first only one species, Sphagnum palustre, was admitted, then it was multiplied into fourteen, then the number fell to four, then rose again to nine, though some were doubtful. They form a great part of every bog in moory districts. [PEAT.] They make excellent bedding material; and when they become lumpy they can be restored to their original softness by being taken out, placed in water, and then dried. In the northern regions they are used for lining clothes, especially boots, and as wicks for lamps. They afford excellent material for enveloping and preserving the roots of plants which have to be sent a long distance.

sphāg-ōl-ō-būs, s. [Gr. sphagē=the throat, and lobos=a lobe.]

Ornith.: A genus of Bucerotidae, with one species (Sphagolobus atratus, the Black Horn-bill), from the west coast of Africa.

sphāl-ēr-īte, s. [Gr. sphaleros=treacherous; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as BLENDE (q. v.). This name was originally proposed by Haidinger, because Blende had been applied to other species, but it was lost sight of till Dana resuscitated it. It is as yet, however, used by few mineralogists.

sphāl-ēr-ō-car-pī-ūm, sphāl-ēr-ō-car-pūm, s. [Gr. sphaleros=slappery, and karpos=fruit.]

Bot.: A fruit with one-seeded, indehiscent pericarp, enclosed within a fleshy perianth. Lindley places it under his collective fruits.

sphar-ģī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spharg(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.] [SPHARGIS.]

sphar-ģīs, s. [Gr. spharagizō=to roar loudly.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Chelonians, with a single species, Sphargis coriacea, often made the type of a family Sphargidae. The skin resembles thick leather, and contains bony deposits, arranged like mosaic, but this dermal shield is not united to the vertebrae and ribs. The bones of the paddles are extremely simple, and claws are absent. The genus is an extremely ancient type, little progress having been made in the development of a bony carapace; and Cope discovered in the Chalk of Kansas a form, which he named Protostega, allied to Sphargis.

sphē-çī-a, s. [Greek sphēx (genit. sphēkos)=a wasp.]

Entom.: A genus of Egeriidae. Abdomen moderately stout, no anal tuft. [HORNET-MOTH.]

†sphē-çī-dæ, †sphē-ģī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sphex, genit. sphexid(is), sphexid(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.] [SPHEX.]

Entom.: A family of Fossorial Hymenoptera, often merged in Crabronidae (q. v.). Antennae generally slender, with long joints, prothorax forming a distinct neck; base of the abdomen constricted into a long petiole. Genera, Sphex, Pepsis, Pompilus, Ammophila, &c.

sphēn-, pref. [SPHENO.]

sphēn-a-cān-thūs, s. [Pref. sphēn-, and Greek akantha=a spine.]

Palæont.: A genus of Plagiostomes, founded on spines from the Coal-measures.

sphēne, s. [Gr. sphēn=a wedge.]

Min.: The same as TITANITE (q. v.).

sphēn-īs-çī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sphenisc(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of Natatorial Birds, equivalent to Huxley's Spheniscomorphae (q. v.). By some authors the genera are subdivided.

sphē-nīs-cō-mor-phæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from spheniscus, and Gr. morphē=form.]

Ornith.: A family of Schizognathae (q. v.). It contains three genera: Eudyptes, Spheniscus, and Aptenodytes. (Proc. Zoöl. Soc., 1867, p. 458.)

sphēn-īs-cūs, s. [Gr. sphēniskos, dimin. from sphēn=a wedge. From the shape of the bill.]

Ornith.: A genus of Spheniscidae. Bill shortish, compressed; maxilla ending in a conspicuous hook. Four species, one ranging as far north as the Galapagos.

sphēn-ō, sphēn-, pref. [Gr. sphēn (genit. sphēnos)=a wedge.] Pertaining to or resembling a wedge in shape.

Anat.: Of or belonging to the jaws and the sphenoid bone; as the spheno-maxillary fissure and fossa.

Anat.: Of or belonging to the orbital bones and to the sphenoid.

spheno-palatine, spheno-palatinæ, a.

Anat.: Of or belonging to the palate bones and to the sphenoid; as the spheno-palatine artery, foramen, and ganglion.

Anat.: Of or belonging to the parietal and the sphenoid. Between these is the spheno-parietal suture.

Anat.: Of or belonging to the temporal and the sphenoid bones.

sphēn-ō-çēph-a-lūs, s. [Pref. spheno, and Gr. kephalē=the head.]

1. Anat.: A malformation of the head in which the upper part of the cranium assumes a wedge-like aspect.

2. Palæont.: A genus of Berycidae, from the Chalk.

sphēn-ō-clāse, s. [Pref. spheno, and Gr. klasis=a fracture.]

Min.: A massive mineral which, when struck, breaks into wedge-shaped fragments. Hardness, 5.5-6; specific gravity, 3.2; luster, feeble; color, pale grayish-yellow; sub-translucent. An analysis yielded: Silica, 46.08; alumina, 13.04; protoxide of iron, 4.77; protoxide of manganese, 3.23; magnesia, 6.25; lime, 26.50=99.87. Found at Gjellebäck, Norway, in layers in a granular limestone.

sphēn-ō-dōn, subst. [Gr. sphēn=a wedge; suff. -odon.]

1. Palæont.: A genus of Bradypodidae, from the bone-caves of Brazil.

2. Zoöl.: The sole recent genus of Rhynchocephalia (q. v.), with one species, Sphenodon punctatus (Hatteria punctata), from New Zealand, where it is called Tuatara by the Maoris. Externally, there is little to distinguish this genus from ordinary lizards, but important differences occur in the structure of the skeleton, viz., the presence of a double horizontal bar across the temporal region, the firm connection of the quadrate bone with the skull and the pterygoid bones, biconcave vertebrae as in the Geckos and many fossil Crocodilians, the presence of an abdominal sternum, and uncinate processes to the ribs (as in Birds).

Sphagnum.

Skull of Sphenodon, Showing Acrodont Jaw.

sphēn'-ō-dūs, s. [Pref. sphen-, and Gr. odous = a tooth.]

Palæont.: A genus of Lamnidæ, founded on teeth from the Jurassic.

sphēn'-ō-grām, subst. [Pref. spheno-, and Gr. gramma = a writing, a letter.] A cuneiform or arrow-headed character. [-GRAM.]

sphēn-ōg'-ra-phēr, s. [Eng. sphenograph(y); -er.] One who is skilled in sphenography, or the deciphering of cuneiform inscriptions.

sphēn-ō-grāph'-īc, a. [Eng. sphenograph(y); -ic.] Of or pertaining to sphenography.

sphēn-ōg'-ra-phīst, s. [Eng. sphenograph(y); -ist.] A sphenographer (q. v.).

sphēn-ōg'-ra-phỹ, s. [Pref. spheno-, and Gr. graphō = to write.] The act or art of writing in cuneiform or arrow-shaped letters or characters; the art of deciphering cuneiform writings or characters; that branch of philological science which concerns itself with cuneiform writings.

sphē-nōg'-ŷn-ē, s. [Pref. spheno-, and Gr. gynē = a female.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Sphenogynæ (q. v.). Garden plants; their flowers orange color, barred with black. They were brought originally from the Cape of Good Hope.

sphēn-ō-gŷn'-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sphenogyn(e); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of Senecionidæ.

sphēn-ōīd, a. & s. [Gr. sphēn = a wedge, and eidos = form, appearance.]

A. As adj.: Resembling a wedge; wedge-shaped.

B. As substantive:

1. Anat.: The sphenoid-bone (q. v.).

2. Crystall.: A wedge-shaped crystal contained under four equal isosceles triangles.

Anat.: A wedge-shaped bone placed across the base of the skull near the middle, and helping to form the cavity of the cranium, the orbits, and the posterior nares. It has a central part or body, two pairs of lateral expansions called the great and small wings, and another pair pointing downward called the pterygoid processes. (Quain.)

sphēn-ōīd'-al, a. [Eng. sphenoid; -al.] Sphenoid (q. v.); as, the sphenoidal fissure, the sphenoidal sinus, &c.

sphēn-ō-lēp'-īs, s. [Pref. spheno-, and Gr. lepis = a scale.]

Palæont.: A genus of Esocidæ, with long wedge-shaped scales, from the freshwater limestone of Aix and the gypsum of Paris.

sphēn-ōn'-chūs (pl. sphēn-ōn'-chī), s. [Prefix sphen-, and Gr. ongkos = a hook, a barb.]

Palæont.: One of the hooked cephalic dermal spines of Hybodus and Acrodus, specimens of which genera are in the British Museum, South Kensington, showing the spines (not more than four in any individual) in situ, but it is not known whether four was the normal number, or if they occurred in all the species. On these spines Agassiz founded a genus Sphenonchus, which he placed with the Hybodontidæ. This has, of course, lapsed, and the word Sphenonchus has now no generic signification.

sphēn-ōph'-ŷl-lūm, s. [Prefix spheno-, and Gr. phyllon = a leaf.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Equisetaceæ(?), allied to (or, according to Mr. Carruthers, identical with) Calamities. They have verticillate leaves, like reversed wedges. Four species from the Carboniferous rocks of Europe; others from North America.

sphēn-ōp'-tēr-īs, subst. [Pref. spheno-, and Gr. pteris = a kind of fern.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Ferns, having the leaves twice- or thrice-pinnate; the leaflets not adhering to the rachis by their whole base, but resembling small wedges reversed, the nervures dividing pinnately from the base. From the Devonian to the Wealden. In the Carboniferous rocks there are thirty-four species, and in the Jurassic seventeen.

sphēn-ō-spōn'-dŷl-ūs, s. [Pref. spheno-, and Gr. spondylos = a vertebra.]

Palæont.: A genus of Deinosaoria or Crocodilia, from the Purbeck beds and the Wealden.

sphēn-ō-za-mī-tēs, s. [Pref. spheno- and Mod. Lat. zamites (q. v.).]

Palæobot.: A genus of Cycads, from the European Jurassic rocks.

sphēr'-al, a. [Eng. spher(e); -al.]

1. Of or pertaining to the spheres or heavenly bodies; inhabiting the spheres. (Lytton: Caxtons, bk. xiv., ch. i.)

2. Rounded like a sphere; sphere-shaped; hence, symmetrical, perfect.

sphère, spere, s. [O. Fr. espere; Fr. sphère, from Lat. sphæra; Gr. sphaira = (1) a ball for playing with, (2) a sphere, a globe.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II.

(2) An orb, a globe, as the sun, the earth, the stars, or planets; one of the heavenly bodies.

(3) An orbicular body representing the earth or the apparent heavens; a celestial or terrestrial globe.

*(4) A circular body; a disc.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Circuit or range of action, knowledge, or influence; compass, province, employment.

"The narrow sphere of our researches."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. iv., ch. ii.

(2) Rank; order or class of society.

*(3) An orbit, a socket.

"Make my two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, l. 5.

II. Technically:

1. Astron.: A term formerly applied to any one of the concentric and eccentric revolving transparent shells in which the heavenly bodies were supposed to be fixed, and by which they were carried so as to produce their apparent motions. The word now signifies the vault of heaven, which to the eye seems the concave side of a hollow sphere, and on which the imaginary circles marking the positions of the equator, the ecliptic, &c., are supposed to be drawn. It is that portion of limitless space which the eye is powerful enough to penetrate, and appears a hollow sphere because the capacity of the eye for distant vision is equal in every direction.

2. Geom.: A solid or volume bounded by a surface, every point of which is equally distant from a point within, called the center. Or it is a volume that may be generated by revolving a semicircle about its diameter as an axis. The distance from any part of the surface to the center is called a radius of the sphere. Every section of a sphere made by a plane is a circle, and all sections made by planes equally distant from the center are equal. A circle of the sphere whose plane passes through the center is a great circle; all other circles are small circles. All great circles are equal, and their radii are equal to the radii of the sphere. The surface of a sphere is equal to the product of the diameter by the circumference of a great circle; or it is equivalent to the area of four great circles. Denoting the radius of the sphere by r, and its diameter by d, we have the following formula for the surface: $s = 4\pi r^2 = \pi d^2 = 3.14159 \dots d^2$. The volume of a sphere is equal to the product of its surface by one-third of its radius. It is also equivalent to two-thirds of the volume of its circumscribing cylinder. The following formula gives the value of the volume of any sphere, whose radius is r and diameter is d: $v = \frac{4}{3}\pi r^3$. Spheres are to one another as the cubes of their diameters.

3. Logic: The extension of a general conception; the individuals and species comprised in any general conception.

¶ (1) Armillary sphere: [ARMILLARY.]

(2) Doctrine of the sphere: The application of geometrical principles to geography and astronomy.

(3) Harmony (or music) of the spheres: [HARMONY, ¶ (4).]

(4) Oblique sphere:

Spherical projection: The case in which the projection is made upon the plane of the horizon of any place not on the equator, or at the poles.

(5) Parallel sphere: [PARALLEL, a.]

(6) Projection of the sphere: [PROJECTION.]

(8) Sphere of influence: A phrase used to denote the particular portion of Asiatic territory occupied and dominated by any of the great powers of Europe for commercial, military or political purposes. In the domination of China by Europe, the northern part including Tibet, Mongolia, Manchuria and the country round Peking, is in the Russian "sphere." Germany's "sphere" is in the region of Shan-Tung province. England's "sphere" is in central China and near India. The French "sphere" is to the south of the British and includes Anam. During recent years the securing of new "spheres of influence" has been the chief business of European diplomacy.

sphere-melody, sphere-music, s. The harmony of the spheres. [HARMONY.]

sphère, sphear, v. t. [SPHERE, s.]

1. Literally:

(1) To place or set among the spheres or heavenly bodies.

(2) To form into roundness; to make round or roundish.

"Blow, villain, till thy sphered bias cheek Outswell the puff'd Aquilon."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, iv. 5.

2. Fig.: To give perfect or complete form to; to concentrate.

"Not vassals to be beat, nor petty babes
To be dandled, no, but living wills, and sphered Whole in ourselves and owed to none."

Tennyson: Princess, iv. 129.

sphēr'-ē-ō-tŷpe, s. [Gr. sphaira = a sphere, and Eng. type.]

Photog.: A positive collodion picture taken upon glass by placing a mat before the plate, so as to give a distinct margin to the picture.

sphēr'-īc-al, sphēr'-īc, adj. [Lat. sphericus; Gr. sphairikos = like a sphere (q. v.); Fr. sphérique; Sp. esferico; Ital. sferico.]

1. Having the form of a sphere; orbicular, globular.

"Some certain determinate figure either round or angular, spherical, cubical . . . or the like."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 858.

2. Pertaining or belonging to a sphere.

*3. Pertaining or relating to the orbs of the planets; planetary. (Shakesp.: Lear, i. 2.)

spherical-aberration, s. [ABERRATION.]

spherical-bracketing, s.

Arch.: The forming of brackets to support lath-and-plaster work, so that the surface of the plaster shall form the surface of a sphere.

spherical case-shot, s. [SHRAPNEL.]

spherical-excess, s. [EXCESS.]

spherical-geometry, s. That branch of geometry which treats of spherical magnitudes, as spherical triangles, areas, and angles.

spherical-lune, s. A portion of the surface of a sphere included between two great semicircles, having a common diameter. The angle of the lune is the same as the angle of the planes of the circles. [LUNE.]

spherical-polygon, s. A portion of the surface of a sphere bounded by the arcs of three or more great circles. Like plane polygons they are named from the number of sides or angles. [POLYGON.]

spherical-projection, s. A representation of the surface of the sphere upon a plane, according to some geometrical law, so that the different points in the representation can be accurately referred to their positions on the surface of the sphere. [PRIMITIVE-CIRCLE, PRIMITIVE-PLANE.]

spherical-pyramid, s. A portion of a sphere bounded by a spherical polygon, and by three or more sectors of great circles meeting at the center of the sphere.

spherical-sector, subst. A portion of a sphere which may be generated by revolving a sector of a circle about a straight line through its vertex as an axis.

spherical-segment, s. A portion of a sphere included between a zone of the surface and a secant plane, or 'etween two parallel secant planes.

spherical-triangle, s. A spherical polygon of three sides. It is a portion of the surface of a sphere bounded by the arcs of three great circles. The points where the arcs meet are called vertices of the triangle, and the arcs are called sides.

spherical-trigonometry, s. [TRIGONOMETRY.]

spherical-ungula, s. A portion of the sphere bounded by a lune and two semicircles meeting in a diameter of the sphere.

spherical-zone, s. A portion of the surface of a sphere included between two parallel planes.

sphēr'-īc-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. spherical; -ly.] In form of a sphere.

"Either spherically or angularly figurate."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 858.

sphēr'-īc-al-nēss, subst. [Eng. spherical; -ness.] The quality or state of being spherical; sphericity.

"Such bodies receive their figure and limits from such lets as hinder them from attaining to that sphericity they aim at."—Digby: On Bodies.

sphēr-īc'-ī-tŷ, s. [Fr. sphéricité.] The quality or state of being spherical; sphericalness, globularity, roundness.

"He espoused the correct view of the earth's sphericity and rotation."—G. H. Lewes: Hist. Philos., ii. 106.

sphēr'-ī-cle, s. [A dimin. from sphere (q. v.).] A little sphere.

sphēr'-īcs, s. [SPHERIC.]

Geom.: The doctrine of the properties of the sphere, considered as a geometrical body, and in particular of the different circles described on its surface, with the method of projecting the same on a plane; spherical geometry and trigonometry.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhñ; -tion, -sion = zhñ. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

sphēr'-ī-fī-cā'-tion, s. [Eng. spherify; c connect., and suff. -ation.] The act of spherifying, the state of being spherified.

"The rupture and general spherification of as many distinct ununiform rings."—Poe: Eureka (Works 1864), ii. 165.

sphēr'-ī-form, sphēr'-y-form, a. [English sphere, and form.] Having the form of a sphere; spheroidal.

"Aristotle dealt not ingeniously with Xenophanes, when from that expression of his, that God was spheryform, he would infer that Xenophanes made God to be a body."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p 378

sphēr'-ī-fy, v. t. [Eng. sphere; -fy.] To make or form into a sphere.

sphēr-ō-bāc-tē'-rī-a, s. pl. The same as Spæro-bacteria (q. v.); the Micrococci. [MICROCOCCLUS.]

sphēr'-ō-grāph, s. [Greek sphaira=a ball, a sphere, and graphō=to write, to draw.]

Navig.: An instrument invented for the mechanical application of spherics to navigation. By its aid any possible spherical triangle can be constructed without dividers or scale. It consists of a stereographic projection of the sphere upon a disk of pasteboard, in which the meridians and parallels of latitude are laid down to single degrees. By its aid, with a ruler and index, the angular position of a ship at any place, and the distance sailed, may be readily and accurately determined on the principle of great circles sailing.

sphēr'-ōld, s. [Gr. sphairoeidēs=sphere-like, from sphaira=a sphere, and eidos=form, appearance; Fr. sphéroïde.]

Geom.: A solid, resembling a sphere in form, and generated by the revolution of an ellipse about one of its axes. If an ellipse be revolved about its transverse axis, the spheroid generated is called a Prolate spheroid; if it be revolved about its conjugate axis, the spheroid generated is called an Oblate spheroid. The earth is an oblate spheroid—that is, flattened at the poles so that its polar is less than its equatorial diameter.

sphēr-ōld'-al, sphēr-ōld'-ic, sphēr-ōld'-ic-al, a. [Eng. spheroid; -al; -ic; -ical.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Having the form of a spheroid.

"If these corpuscles be spheroidal, or oval, their shortest diameters must not be much greater than those of light."—Cheyne.

II. Crystallog.: Bounded by several convex faces.

spheroidal-bracketing, s.

Arch.: Bracketing prepared for a plaster ceiling whose surface is to form that of a spheroid.

spheroidal-excess, s. [EXCESS, s. ¶.]

spheroidal-triangle, s. A triangle on the surface of a spheroid, analogous to a spherical triangle.

sphēr-ōld'-ī-tŷ, sphēr-ōld'-īc'-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. spheroid, spheroidic; -ity.] The quality or state of being spheroidal.

sphēr-ōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. sphaira=a sphere, and Eng. meter.] An instrument for measuring the curvature of surfaces. It consists of a three-armed frame, standing on three steel pins, which form with each other an equilateral triangle; in the center of the instrument is a vertical screw with a fine thread, and having a large graduated head.

sphēr-ō-sī-dēr'-ite, s. [SPHÆROSIDERITE.]

sphēr'-ū-lā, s. [Latin, dimin. from sphæra=a sphere (q. v.).]

Bot.: A globose peridium with a central opening, through which are emitted sporidia mixed with a gelatinous pulp. It occurs in fungals.

sphēr'-ū-lāte, a. [Eng. spherul(e); -ate.] Covered or studded with spherules; having one or more rows of minute tubercles.

sphēr'-ūle, s. [SPHERULA.] A little sphere or spherical body.

"Their parts, or little spherules, become more neighbourly, or contiguous."—Brooke: Universal Beauty, bk. ii. (Note.)

sphēr'-ū-līte, s. [Latin sphærola=a little sphere or globe, and Greek lithos=a stone; German sphärolit, sphärolithe.]

Petrol.: A name originally applied to a variety of pearl-stone or pitchstone (q. v.), which consists of an aggregate of spheroidal concretions, but it is now applied to the parts of any rock which may have a similar structure.

sphēr'-ū-lit'-ic, a. [Eng. spherulit(e); -ic.]

Petrol.: Partaking of the structure of a Spherulite (q. v.).

sphēr'-y, a. [Eng. spher(e); -y.]

1. Pertaining or belonging to the spheres.

"She can teach ye how to climb Higher than the sphery chime."

Milton: Comus, 1,021.

2. Resembling a sphere or star in roundness, brightness, or the like.

"Make me compare with Hermia's sphery eyne."

Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 3.

sphēt'-ēr-ize, v. t. [Gr. spheterizō, from spheteros=their own; sphēis=they.] To appropriate; to make one's own. (Burke.)

sphēx, s. [Gr. sphēx (genit. sphēkos)=a wasp.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Sphecidae or Sphegidae. They are large, solitary, wasp-like insects, some of them two inches long. They store their nests with caterpillars, which they paralyze by two stings. The genus is cosmopolitan. One of the best known species, Spheg flavipennis, is common in the south of Europe.

sphīg-mōm'-ē-tēr, s. [SPHYGMOMETER.]

sphīnc'-tēr, s. [Greek sphingktēr=that which binds tight; sphingō=to bind tight.]

Anat.: A more or less circular muscle which contracts or shuts any natural orifice, as the bladder, the anus, &c.

"Nature has furnished the body of this little creature with a glutinous liquid, which it spins into thread, coarser or finer, as it chooses to contract or dilate its sphincter."—Goldsmith: The Bee; No. 4.

sphīn'-gēs, s. pl. [SPHINX, 3. (3).]

sphīn'-gī'-dā, s. pl. [Latin sphinx, genitive sphing(is); fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: The typical family of Sphingina (q. v.). Antennæ slightly thickened in the middle, generally terminating in a hooked bristle; wings large, clothed with scales; the anterior part long and pointed, or with the hind margin indented. Larva generally naked, with a horn on the back of the twelfth segment. Pupa subterranean.

sphīn'-gī'-nā, s. [Lat. sphinx, genit. sphing(is); neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Entom.: Sphinges or Hawk-moths; a group of Heterocera, having the antennæ fusiform. [CREPUSCULARIA, HAWK-MOTH.]

Zoöl.: A synonym of Syntherina (q. v.), with three genera: Erithizon, Chætomys, and Sphingurus (=Syntheres). [TREE-PORCUPINES.]

†sphīn'-gūr'-ūs, s. [Gr. sphingō=to bind tight, to squeeze, and oura=a tail.] [SPHINGURINÆ, SYNTERINÆ.]

sphīnx (pl. sphīnx'-ēs), subst. [Lat., from Gr. sphingx.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II. 1.

2. Fig.: One who proposes riddles, puts puzzles or obscure questions, or talks enigmatically.

II. Technically:

1. Antiq.: A fabled monster, half woman and half lion, said by the Grecian poets to have infested the city of Thebes, devouring its inhabitants till such time as a riddle it had proposed to them should be solved. The riddle was as follows: "What animal is that which goes on four feet in the morning, on two at noon, and three in the evening?" Numerous victims fell before the monster, till at length Œdipus, who was then at Thebes, came forward, and answered the sphinx that it was Man, who, when an infant, creeps on all fours; when he has attained to manhood goes on two feet; and, when old, uses a staff—a third foot. The sphinx thereupon flung herself down to the earth and perished; and Œdipus was, by the gratitude of the Thebans, chosen their king.

2. Egypt. Antiq.: A figure having the body of a lion, winged, and a human (male or female) head. Those with human heads were called Androsphinxes. Sphinxes are also represented with the heads of rams and hawks (Criosphinx, Hieracosphinx). The Egyptian sphinx had no wings; these were added by the Greek artists. The Grecian Sphinx was probably borrowed from the Egyptian.

3. Entomology:

* (1) A comprehensive genus under which Linnæus placed all Hawk-moths.

(2) The typical genus of Sphingidae. Hind wings rounded at the anal angle, or with a hardly perceptible projection. The species fly with great velocity in the dusk, remaining for a time poised above flowers, sucking the honey from them without alighting. Two, Sphinx ligustri, the Privet Hawk-moth (q. v.), and S. convolvuli, are families.

(3) Any individual of the modern genus Sphinx [(2)]. In this sense the plural is Sphinges.

4. Zoöl.: [SPHINX-BABOON.]

sphinx-baboon, s.

Zoöl.: Cynocephalus sphinx, a large species from the West of Africa. They are good-tempered and playful when young, but become morose and fierce as they grow older. They bear confinement well, and are common in menageries.

sphrāg'-īd, sphrāg'-īd-ite, s. [Greek sphragis (genit. sphragidos)=a seal, a signet; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given to a clay in ancient times used as a medicine, and stamped with a seal, hence the name. It was also called Terra sigillata, and is the Terra lemmia of Pliny. Composition: Like all other clays, essentially a hydrated silicate of alumina, but contains some soda, hence its medicinal use.

sphra-gīs'-tīcs, s. [Gr. sphragistikos=pertaining to seals or sealing.] [SPHRAGID.] The science of seals, their history, peculiarities, and distinctions. Its chief use is to determine the age and genuineness of documents to which seals are affixed.

sphrīg'-ō-sīs, s. [Greek sphrigaō=to be full to bursting.]

Veg. Pathol.: Morbid luxuriance in plants. It may exist in fruit trees, in cereals, in potatoes, &c. There is often a peculiar greenness, sometimes produced by fungi, which foreshadows decay.

sphŷg'-mīc, a. [Gr. sphygmos=the pulse.] Of or pertaining to the pulse.

sphŷg'-mō-grāph, s. [Gr. sphygmos=the pulse, and graphō=to write, to draw.]

Med.: An instrument used for recording the character of the movements of the pulse. An instrument for this purpose was constructed by Ludwig in 1847, and several forms of sphygmograph are now in use. That most generally employed was first described by Marey in 1863. It consists of an ivory pad, which rests on the pulse, and is connected with one end of a delicate spring, the other end of the spring being fastened to a framework. The movements of the pulse, acting on the pad, are communicated to a system of two light levers, one of which carries a small point, or pen (a), which produces a trace on a piece of smoked glass or paper (b) attached to a brass plate, which is moved along by clockwork. The character of the trace thus produced depends on the character of the movements of the pulse, which are magnified about fifty times by means of the levers. The information gained by the examination of these sphygmographic traces is of the greatest value in the diagnosis of affections of the heart, &c.

sphŷg'-mō-grāph'-īc, adject. [English sphygmograph; -ic.] Of or pertaining to the sphygmograph; traced or marked by a sphygmograph.

sphŷg'-mōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. sphygmos=the pulse, and Eng. meter.]

Med.: A comprehensive name for any instrument for measuring and recording the movements of the pulse.

sphŷg'-mō-phōne, s. [Gr. sphygmos=the pulse, and phōnē=sound.]

Med.: An instrument devised to enable a person to determine the rhythms, &c., of the pulse at a distance by means of the electric-wire. (Dunghison.) The gas sphygmoscope is sometimes modified, so as to render the variation of the pulse audible.

sphŷg'-mō-scōpe, s. [Gr. sphygmos=the pulse, and skopeō=to observe.]

Med.: An instrument for rendering the movements of the pulse visible. Marey's sphygmoscope consists of a small glass cylinder containing a small indiarubber bag, connected with a receiving and a registering tambour. The expansion of the indiarubber bag, consequent on the pressure on the receiving tambour, compresses the air in the cylinder and so effects the recorder. The gas sphygmoscope consists of a metal chamber with a bottom of delicate membrane, with a service pipe at the side and a fine burner at the top. When the membrane is placed over an artery and the gas lit, the movements of the pulse are shown by up-and-down movements of the flame. [SPHYGMOPHONE.]

(1) An outrigger to keep a block from the ship's side.

(2) An iron hoop around the mast for the attachment of the futtock-shrouds.

(3) A hoop around a mast provided with belaying pins.

5. Zoölogy:

(1) The popular name of any individual of Huxley's Araneina (q. v.). The species are very numerous and universally distributed, the largest being found in the tropics. The abdomen is without distinct divisions, and is generally soft and tumid; the legs are eight in number, seven-jointed, the last joint armed with two hooks usually toothed like a comb. The distal joint of the palces is folded down on the next, like the blade of a pocket-knife upon the handle, and the duct of a poison-gland in the cephalothorax opens at the summit of the terminal joint. There are two or four pulmonary sacs and a tracheal system; eyes generally eight in number; no auditory organs have been discovered. Their most characteristic organ is the arachnidium, the apparatus by which fine silky threads—in the majority of the species utilized for spinning a web—are produced. In Epeira diadema, the Common Garden Spider, more than a thousand glands, with separate excretory ducts, secrete the viscid material of the web. These ducts ultimately enter the six prominent arachnidial mammillæ, projecting from the hinder end of the abdomen, and having their terminal faces beset with minute arachnidial papillæ, by which the secretion of the gland is poured out. By means of these silky threads, spiders form their dwellings and construct ingenious nets for the capture of their prey; these threads serve also as a safeguard against falling, and as a means of transport from one elevated object to another, being thrown out as a sort of flying bridge. The webs are in high repute for stanching blood; the threads are employed for the cross lines in astronomical telescopes, and have been made into textile fabrics as articles of curiosity. Spiders are essentially predaceous, and adopt various devices as nets, traps, and ambushes, for the capture of their prey; but the fate of the victim is always the same—the claw-joints of the palces are buried in the body, inflicting a poisonous wound, and the juices are then sucked out by the muscular apparatus appended to the oesophagus of the spider. The bite of none of the species is dangerous to man. [TARANTULA.] They are extremely pugnacious, and in their combats often sustain the loss of a limb, which, like the Crustaceans, they have the power of reproducing. The males are smaller than the females, which they approach with great caution, as they run great risk of being devoured, even at the time of impregnation. The eggs are numerous, and usually enveloped in a cocoon or egg-case; the young undergo no metamorphosis. The chief species are described in this Dictionary under their popular names.

"Scaliger relates that in Gascony, his country, there are spiders of that virulency, that if a man treads upon them, to crush them, their poison will pass through the very soles of his shoes."—Derham: Phys. Theol., bk. iv., ch. xiii. (Note.)

(2) A Spider-crab (q. v.).

"Like all the other triangular Crustacea, the fishermen inveterately term it 'spider;' and they appear to have very little idea of any affinity between these forms and the crabs properly so called."—Bell: British Stalk-eyed Crustacea, p. 42.

spīder-ant, s.

Entomology: A name sometimes applied to the European species Mutilla (q. v.), from the fact that the females have a somewhat spider-like appearance.

spīder-catcher, s.

Ornithology:

1. Arachnothera, a genus of Indian birds, family Meliphagidæ.

2. The Wall-creeper (q. v.).

spider-crab, s.

Zoölogy: Any crab of the family Mauidæ (q. v.). One of the commonest is Maia squinado, the Spinous Spider-crab (q. v.).

Ornith.: The same as SPIDER-CATCHER, 1.

spider-fly, s.

Entom.: A popular name for various insects of the genera Hippobosca and Nycteribia.

spider-line, s.

Optics: A filament of spider's web used in micrometers for delicate astronomical observations.

spider-mite, s.

Zoöl. (pl.): The Gamasei.

spider-monkey, s.

Zoöl.: A popular name for any individual of the genus Ateles (q. v.), so called because, in the opinions of the Europeans who first saw them in their native forests, their long limbs gave them some distant resemblance to immense spiders.

spider-orchis, s.

Botany: Ophrys aranifera. Sepals yellow-green inside, petals oblong, lip broad and convex without an appendage, anther beaked.

spider-shell, s. [SCORPION-SHELL.]

spi-dêred, a. [Eng. spider; -ed.] Infested with spiders; cobwebbed.

"Content can visit the poor spidered room."

Wolcott: Peter Pindar, p. 39.

spi-dêr-like, a. [Eng. spider, and like.] Like or resembling a spider.

"Spider-like

Out of his self-drawing web he gives us note."

Shakesp.: Henry VIII., i. 1.

spi-dêr-wôrt, s. [Eng. spider, and wort.]

Botany:

1. Sing.: (1) The genus Tradescantia; spec., Tradescantia virginica; (2) Anthericum serotinum.

2. Pl.: The order Commelynaceæ (q. v.).

spiê-gel-ei'-şen, s. [Ger. (See def.)]

Metall.: A name applied by the Germans to a variety of cast-iron, which is coarsely crystalline, the large crystal planes having bright reflections. Numerous analyses show that it contains about five per cent. of combined carbon, but although most, if not all, analyses show a fair proportion of manganese to be present it is still regarded as uncertain whether this element or the combined carbon determines the crystallization.

spier, s. [SPIRE, 3.]

spiër, v. t. or i. [SPEIR.]

spif-fy, adj. [Etym. doubtful.] Spruce, fine, showy. (Slang.)

spif-li-câte, v. t. [Etym. doubtful.] To crush; to smash up. (Slang.)

"The way in which the learned, racy old Hector smashes and spificates scientific idiots is delicious."—British Quarterly Review (1873), ivii. 276.

spif-li-câ'-tion, subst. [Eng. spiflica(te); -tion.] The act of spificating; the condition of being spificated.

"Whose blood he vowed to drink—the Oriental form of threatening spification."—Burton: El Medinah, i. 204.

spig-êl'-ê-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spigelia(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Loganiaceæ (q. v.).

spi-gê-lî-â, s. [Named after Adrian Spigelius (died 1625), Prof. of Anatomy and Surgery at Padua, and a botanical author.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Loganiaceæ. Calyx five-parted; corolla funnel-shaped; limb five-cleft; anthers converging; capsule two-celled, four-valved, many-seeded. Known species about thirty, from the warmer parts of America. Various species, as Spigelia glabra, are poisonous; S. marilandica, the Carolina Pink-root, and S. anthelmia, are anthelmintic and narcotic.

spi-gê-lî-â-çê-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spigelia(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: The same as LOGANIACEÆ (q. v.).

Bot.: A partial spike in grasses.

spike'-nard, s. [Eng. spike, and nard; Mod. Lat. spica nardi.]

1. Botany:

(1) Nardostachys jatamansi, called in Hindustan Jatamansi and Balkhar. The root, which is from three to twelve inches long, sends up many stems, with little spikes of purple flowers, which have four stamens. It grows in the Himalayas at an elevation of from 11,000 to 15,000, or in Sikkim to 17,000 feet. [2.] [FLOWMAN'S SPIKENARD.]

(2) Valeriana celtica, and in various countries other plants.

2. Perfumes: An aromatic substance derived from the root of Nardostachys jatamansi [(1)]. (Song i. 12, iv. 13, 14.) It was highly prized by the ancients, and used by them both in baths and at feasts as an unguent (cf. Hor. Carm., ll. xi. 16, 17; IV. xii. 16, 17), and the women of Nepaul still employ oil in which the root has been steeped for perfuming their hair. The "ointment of spikenard," with which our Lord was anointed as He sat at meat in the house of Simon of Bethany (Mark xiv. 3; John xii. 3) was prepared from it. Its costliness may be inferred from the indignant surprise of Judas (John xii. 5; cf. Hor., ubi sup.). Sometimes applied to the ointment itself, as in the example.

"She bows, she bathes her Savior's feet

With costly spikenard and with tears."

Tennyson: In Memoriam, xxxii. 12.

spik'-y, spik'-ey, a. [Eng. spik(e) (1), s.; -y.]

1. In the shape of a spike; having a sharp point or points.

3. To throw, as from a horse or carriage. (Colloq.)

4. To suffer to fall or run out of a vessel; to lose or suffer to be scattered. (Applied only to fluids and substances whose particles are small and loose; as, to spill water out of a jug; to spill quicksilver; to spill powders. It differs from pour in denoting an accidental or undesigned loss or waste.)

"Like the fair pearl-necklace of the Queen, That burst in dancing, and the pearls were spilt."—Tennyson: Vivien, 302.

5. To suffer or cause to flow out; to shed. (Applied especially with regard to blood. Formerly applied also to tears.)

"Enough of blood rests on my head, Too rashly spilled."—Scott: Lord of the Isles, iii. 18.

II. Naut.: To discharge the wind from, as from the belly of a sail.

B. Intransitive:

*1. To be ruined or destroyed; to come to ruin.

"That thou wolt soffren innocence to spill, And wicked folke regne in prosperitee."—Chaucer: C. T., 5, 234.

*2. To waste; to be prodigal.

"Thy father bids thee spare, and chides for spilling."—Sidney.

3. To fall.

*4. To be shed; to be suffered to fall; to be lost or shed.

"He was so topfull of himself, that he let it spill on all the company; he spoke well indeed, but he spoke too long."—Watts.

spille, v. t. & i. [SPILL, v.]

spill'-ēr, s. [Eng. spill, v.; -er.]

1. One who spills or sheds; a shedder.

2. A kind of fishing-line.

"In harbor they are taken by spillers made of a cord, to which divers shorter are tied at a little distance, and to each of these a hook is fastened with a bait; this spiller they sink in the sea where those fishes have their accustomed haunt."—Carew: Survey of Cornwall.

spill'-ēt, spill'-iard (i as y), s. [Apparently a dimin. from spill (1), s.] (See compound.)

spillet-fishing, spillard-fishing, s. A method of fishing practiced in the west of Ireland, in which a number of hooks are set on snoods, and all on one line. Called also Bultow or Bultow-fishing.

spill'-li-kēn, s. [SPILIKEN.]

spill'-līng, pr. par. or a. [SPILL, v.] spilling-line, s.

Naut.: A line to spill the wind out of a sail, by keeping it from belling out when clewed up.

spī-lō-gā'-ā, s. [Gr. spilos=a spot, and gala=the earth.]

Bot.: A spurious genus of Coniomycetous Fungals, the immature state of various species of Cladosprium.

spī-lō-gā'-lē, s. [Gr. spilos=a spot, and galē=a weasel.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Melidæ, frequently merged in Mephitis (q. v.).

spill-or'-nīs, s. [Gr. spilos=a spot, and ornis=a bird.]

Ornith.: A genus of Aquilinæ, with six species, from the Oriental region and Celebes. Formerly made a sub-genus of Circæus (q. v.).

spī'-lō-gīte, subst. [Gr. spilos=a spot; suff. -ite (Petrol.).]

Petrology: A gray slate occurring in the Hartz Mountains, which incloses numerous dark-brown grains, giving it a spotted aspect.

spilt, pret. & pa. par. of v. [SPILL, v.]

spīl'-tēr, s. [SPILL (1), s.] One of the small branches on a stag's head. [SPELDER.]

"Such spilters and trochings on their heads."—Howell: Parly of Beasts, p. 62.

spīlth, subst. [Eng. spil(l), v.; -th.] The act of spilling; that which is spilt or poured out lavishly.

"Our vaults have wept with drunken spilth of wine."—Shakesp.: Timon of Athens, ii. 2.

spī'-lūs, s. [Gr. spilos=a spot.]

1. Bot.: A brownish spot, constituting the hilum in grasses.

2. Pathol.: The same as NÆVUS (q. v.).

spī'-lŷte, s. [SPILOSITE.]

Petrol.: A compact, grayish, felsitic rock, containing globules of carbonate of lime, the base containing, according to Didot, 70 per cent. of albite (q. v.).

spīn, spīnne, spynne (pa. t. span*, spun, pa. par. sponnen*, spun), v. t. & i. [A. S. spinnan (pa. t. spann, pa. par. sponnen); cogn. with Dut. spinnen; Icel. & Sw. spinna; Dan. spinde; Goth. spinnan; Ger. spinnen. Allied to span (q. v.).]

A. Transitive:

1. To draw out and twist into threads, either by the hand or with machinery.

"The women spun goats' hair."—Exodus xxxv. 26.

2. To work on as if spinning; to draw out tediously; to extend to a great length. (Generally with out.)

"Mr. Cowen never spins out an argument; he reduces it to the compactest form and the fewest words."—London Daily Telegraph.

3. To protract; to spend by delays. Followed by out.)

"By one delay after another, they spin out their whole lives, till there's no more future left before 'em."—L'Estrange.

4. To cause to whirl or turn with great speed, to whirl.

"The groups of children who spin their tops on the pavement look rosy and warm."—Pall Mall Gazette, March 31, 1886.

5. To form as a filament or thread by the extension of a viscid fluid, which hardens upon coming into contact with the air. (Said of spiders, silk-worms, and the like.)

"Spinning fine nets for the catching of flies."—Sharp: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 1.

6. To fish with spinning or spoon-bait.

"He was to be occasionally seen spinning the weir pool and scours below Marsh Lock."—Field, Jan. 30, 1886.

*7. To supply continuously.

"Stockes of cattle spinning forth milke abundantly."—Howell: Camden, p. 279.

B. Intransitive:

1. To perform the operation of spinning or of making threads; to work at drawing out and twisting threads.

"Biholdē ye the lilies of the feeld hou thei wexen: thei trauelen not, neither spynnen."—Wycliffe: Luke xii.

2. To revolve or whirl round with great speed; to move round rapidly.

"Quick and more quick he spins in giddy gyres."—Dryden: Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii.

*3. To stream or issue in a thread or small current.

"The blood out of their helmets span, So sharp were their encounters."—Drayton: Nymphalia.

4. To run or drive with great rapidity; to move quickly; as, to spin along a road.

*¶ (1) To spin a fair thread: To busy one's self about trifles.

(2) To spin a yarn: To tell a long story. (Orig. a seaman's phrase.)

"The yarn is spun by Ben Campion, the old salt who was its hero."—Observer, Dec. 20, 1885.

(3) To spin hay:

Mil.: To twist it into ropes for convenient carriage on an expedition.

spīn, subst. [SPIN, v.] The act of spinning; a rapid uninterrupted action; a single effort, as in a race.

"After a short undecided spīn, Athos took a good lead."—Field, Dec. 6, 1884.

spī'-nā (pl. spī'-næ), s. [Lat.] A thorn, a prickle; the backbone or spine.

spina-bīfida, s.

Pathol.: Cleft spine; a congenital malformation of frequent occurrence, arising from arrest of development. It may be regarded as a hernia of the membranes of the spinal cord through a fissure in the wall of the bony canal. The person affected may occasionally survive till middle life, but the disease usually terminates fatally.

spī'-nā'-ceous (ce as sh), a. [SPINACH.] Pertaining or relating to spinach, or to the class of plants to which it belongs.

spīn'-ach, spīn'-age (ach, age as īg), s. [Ital. spinace; Sp. espinaca; Port. espinafre; Low Latin spinacia, spinacium, spinathia, spinarium, from Lat. spina=a thorn. So named from its pointed leaves, or from the processes of the seed.]

1. Hort.: The genus Spinacia (q. v.), and specially Spinacea oleracea, Common or Garden Spinach. It is a hardy annual with large, succulent, triangular leaves on long petioles. Its home is unknown, but it is extensively cultivated in various countries. Some varieties have prickly, others smooth, seeds. The leaves are used as a vegetable; they are generally boiled and served with meat as a purée, or with cream and gravy, or pressed into a mold and served with poached eggs. In India the seeds are given for difficult breathing, inflammation of the liver, and jaundice. [HEATH-SPINACH, WILD-SPINACH.]

2. Entomol.: A European geometer moth, Cidaria dotata.

spī'-nā'-cī-ā, s. [SPINACH.]

Botany: Spinach; a genus of Chenopodiaceæ. Flowers dioecious, the males with five stamens, the females with four styles and simple stigmas. Known species, two. [SPINACH.]

spī'-nāç'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spinax, genit. spinac(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -īdæ.]

1. Ichthy.: A family of Selachioidei (q. v.), with ten recent genera, of which the most important are Centrina, Acanthias, Centrophorus, Spinax, Scymnus, Lemargus, and Echinorhinus. No nictitating membrane; two dorsals, no anal fin; spiracles present; gill-openings narrow.

2. Palæont.: Two genera, Palæospinax and Prog-nathodus, from the Lias, and two, Drepanaphorus and Spinax, from the Chalk.

spīn'-āl, adj. [Latin spinalis, from spina=the spine.] Pertaining or relating to the spine or backbone of an animal.

Surg.: A brace for remedying posterior curvature of the spine.

spinal-column, s. [SPINE.]

spinal-cord, spinal-marrow, s.

Anat.: That part of the cerebro-spinal axis which is situated within the vertebral canal. It extends from the margin of the foramen magnum of the occipital bone to about the lower part of the body of the first lumbar vertebra. It is continued above into the medulla oblongata, and ends below in a slender filament, the filum terminale, or central ligament of the spinal cord. It is invested by a membrane called the pia mater, surrounded by a sheath formed by the dura mater. Between this and the pia mater is the arachnoid membrane and the cerebro-spinal fluid. It is subject to various diseases, as spinal congestion, hæmorrhage, irritation, meningitis, myelitis, paralysis, &c.

spī'-nāx, s. [Lat. spina=a spine.]

Ichthy. & Palæont.: A genus of Spinacidae (q. v.), with three small species from the Atlantic and southern extremity of America. Each dorsal with a spine; spiracles wide, superior, behind the eye. [SPINACIDÆ, 2.]

spīn'-dle, spīn-el, spīn-nel (Prov.), spīn-dele, spīn-dell, s. [A. S. spīnl, from spinnan=to spin; O. Dut. spille; Dut. spil (for spīnle); O. H. Ger. spinale; Ger. spille, spindel. The d is excrescent as in sound, thunder, &c.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 6.

"The enormous wheel that turns ten thousand spīn-dles."—Wordsworth: Excursion, vii.

*2. A long slender stalk.

"The spīndles must be tied up, and, as they grow in height, rods set by them, lest by their bending they should break."—Mortimer: Husbandry.

3. Any slender pointed rod which turns round, or on which anything turns; as—

(1) A shaft, as of a fusee; the axis of a capstan.

(2) The rod which forms the axis of a vane.

(3) A round connecting piece in a chair, as the vertical pieces uniting the seat and slat top.

(4) The stem of a door-knob, which actuates the latch.

*4. Something very thin and slender.

"I am fall'n away to nothing, to a spīndle."—Beaum. & Flet.: Woman Pleas'd, iv. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Build.: The same as NEWEL (q. v.).

2. Founding: The pin on which the pattern of a mold is formed.

3. Geom.: A solid generated by revolving a portion of a curve about a chord perpendicular to an bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, thīs; sin, ag; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion. -sion = shūn; -tīon, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

axis of the curve.' The spindle takes its name from the curve which is revolved, as the hyperbolic, the parabolic, the elliptic, &c., spindles.

4. Lathe: The arbor or mandrel. [HEADSTOCK, TAILSTOCK.]

5. Mill: A vertical shaft supporting the upper stone or runner of the pair in a flour-mill.

6. Spinning:

(1) A skewer or an axis upon which a bobbin is placed to wind the yarn as it is spun. As in a lathe, the spindles are said to be live or dead, according as they do, or do not, rotate. A ring-spindle has a traveling ring upon it.

(2) A pendent piece of wood for twisting and winding the fibers drawn from the distaff.

(3) The pin used in spinning-wheels for twisting the thread, and on which the thread, when twisted, is wound.

(4) A measure of length; a spindle of eighteen hanks of cotton yarn is 15,120 yards; a spindle of twenty-four heers of linen yarn is 14,400 yards.

7. Shipwright: The upper main piece of a made mast.

8. Vehicles: The tapering end or arm on the end of the axle-tree. The hub of the wheel is slipped on the spindle, and is secured there by a linch-pin in some cases, and by a nut in others.

9. Weaving: The skewer in a shuttle on which a bobbin or cop of yarn or thread is impaled.

10. Zoöl.: [SPINDLE-SHELL.]

spindle-lathe, s. [LATHE.]

spindle-legged, a. Having long, thin legs.

spindle-legs, spindle-shanks, s. pl. Long, thin legs; hence applied to a long, slender person, humorously or contemptuously.

"The marriage of one of our heiresses with an eminent courtier gave us spindle-shanks and cramps."—Tatler.

Bot.: The genus Fusarium.

spindle-shanked, a. Spindle-legged (q. v.).

spindle-shanks, s. pl. [SPINDLE-LEGS.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Having the shape of a spindle; fusiform.

2. Bot.: Thick, tapering to each end, as the root of the long radish.

Zoöl.: Fusus antiquus. Called also Buckie, Roaring Buckie, and Red Whelk.

spindle-side, subst. The female side in descent. [SPEAR-SIDE.]

"I am not sure that he does not think it a conspiracy of all those to settle the representation of the martial De Caxtons on the spindle-side."—Lytton: Caxtons, pt. xviii., ch. viii.

spindle-step, s. The lower bearing of an upright spindle. Used in mill and spinning spindles.

Zoöl.: The genus Rostellaria (q. v.).

spindle-tree, s.

Botany:

1. The genus Euonymus (q. v.); specif. Euonymus europæus, so named because it furnishes a hard-grained wood which is used for spindles, pins, or skewers.

2. (Pl.): The order Celastraceæ (q. v.).

Spindle-tree oil:

Chem.: A fatty oil extracted by pressure from the seeds of the spindle-tree. It is clear, reddish-brown, has a repulsive odor, and bitter taste, soluble in alcohol and ether, specific gravity 0.933, and solidifies between 12° and 16°.

spindle-valve, subst. A valve having an axial guide-stem.

spindle-whorl, spindle-whirl, s.

Archæol.: A small perforated disk forming a rude fly-wheel, formerly fixed on the spindle to maintain its rotatory motion before the introduction of the spinning-wheel. [SNAKE-STONE.] They are often met with in sepulchral chambers, and the oldest are probably of Neolithic age. The specimen in the illustration was found at Holyhead.

Spindle-whorl.

Zoöl.: The caterpillar of an American moth, Gortyna zœæ, which burrows into the stem of maize and some other cereals.

spin'-dle, v. i. [SPINDLE, s.] To shoot, grow, or extend into a long, slender stalk or body. (Cowper: Tasks, v. 11.)

spind'-ling, subst. [Eng. spindl(e); -ing.] The Spindle-tree (q. v.). (Tennyson: Amphion, 92.)

spin'-drift, s. [A variant of spoon-drift (q. v.).]

Naut.: The blinding haze of salt water blown from the surface of the sea in a hurricane.

"Driving the *spindrif*t like clouds of smoke before it."—Field, Dec. 19, 1885.

spine, s. [O. Fr. espine (Fr. épine), from Latin spina=a thorn, a prick, the spine; allied to spike (q. v.); Sp. espina; Port. espinha.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In any of the senses of II.

2. A ridge of mountains, especially a central ridge.

3. A longitudinal slat of a riddle.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: An indurated branch or process formed of woody fiber and not falling off like a prick from the part that bears it. Sometimes spines are transformed tendrils. Spines on the leaves are formed by the lengthening of the woody tissue of the veins, in which case they project beyond the margin of the leaf, as in the holly, or they arise from a contraction of the parenchyma of the leaves, as in the barberry.

"Roses, their sharp spines being gone."

Two Noble Kinsmen, i. 1.

2. Comparative Anatomy:

(1) The vertebral column. [VERTEBRA.]

"The spine, or back-bone, is a chain of joints of very wonderful construction."—Paley: Nat. Theology, ch. viii.

(2) A slender, sharp or pointed process, as the nasal spine, the neural-spine, &c. Called also a Spinous process.

(3) A stout, rigid, and pointed process of the integument, formed externally by the epidermis, and internally of a portion of the cutis. Sometimes used of stout, rigid, and pointed processes of the epidermis only.

3. Mach.: A longitudinal ridge; a fin.

spine-bearers, s. pl. [SPINIGERI.]

spine-tails, s. pl.

Ornith.: The family Dendrocolaptidæ. They owe their popular name to their more or less rigid tail-feathers. Messrs. Sclater and Salvin divided the family into five sub-families: Furnariinæ, Sclerurinae, Synallinæ (to which the name Spine-tails is sometimes confined), Philydorinæ, and Dendrocolaptinæ.

spined, a. [Eng. spin(e); -ed.] Having spines; spiny; as, a spined caterpillar, spined cicadas. (Swainson & Shuckard: Insects, p. 405.)

spin'-el (1), subst. [Gr. spinos, spinthēr=a spark (King); Lat. spinella; Fr. spinelle; Ger. spinell; Ital. spinella.]

Mineralogy:

1. The type species of a group of minerals called the Spinel Group, crystallizing in the isometric system, and being compounds of protoxides and sesquioxides with the typical formula RO_2O_3 .

2. A mineral occurring in crystals of octahedral habit, and very rarely massive. Hardness, 8.0; specific gravity, 3.5-4.1; luster, vitreous to splendid, sometimes dull; color, many shades of red, also blue, green, yellow, brown, and black; sometimes nearly white, or colorless; transparent to opaque; fracture, conchoidal. Composition: When pure, alumina, 72.0; magnesia, 28.0=100, corresponding with the formula, $MgOAl_2O_3$; but the magnesia is often partly replaced by other protoxides, and the alumina by sesquioxides, giving rise to many varieties. Dana thus distinguishes them:

(1) Ruby or magnesia-spinel; with specific gravity 3.52-3.58; (a) spinel-ruby, deep red; (b) balas-ruby, rose-red; (c) rubicelle, yellow or orange-red; (d) almandine, violet.

(2) Ceylonite, or iron-magnesia spinel=pleonaste, containing much iron; color, dark green to black.

(3) Magnesia-lime-spinel; color, green.

(4) Chlorospinel; color, grass-green, with the iron constituent as sesquioxide.

(5) Picotite, containing over seven per cent. of oxide of chromium.

Found embedded in crystalline limestone, and associated with calcite in various rocks, also in the dolomitic agglomerate of Monte Somma.

spinel-ruby, s. [BALAS-RUBY.]

spin'-el (2), s. [Etym. doubtful.] Bleached yarn for the manufacture of inkle (q. v.).

spine'-less, a. [Eng. spine; -less.] Destitute of a spine; hence, limp. [INVERTEBRATE.]

"A remarkably stout father, and three spineless sons."—Dickens: Uncommercial Traveler, iv.

spin'-ell-âne, s. [Eng. spinell; suff. -ane (Min.).] Min.: The same as NOSITE (q. v.).

spin'-ell-îne, s. [Eng. spinell; suff. -ine (Min.).] Min.: The same as SEMELINE (q. v.).

spin'-es-çent, adj. [Lat. spinescens, pr. par. of spinesco=to grow thorny; spina=a thorn.]

Bot.: Tending to be spinous; somewhat spinous.

spin'-ët (1), spin'-nët, s. [O. Fr. espinette (Fr. épinette); from Ital. spinetta, dimin. of spina=a thorn. Named from a fancied resemblance of its quill plectra to spines or thorns.]

Music: An ancient keyed instrument similar in construction to, but smaller in size than, the harpsichord. The strings, which were placed at an angle with the keys, were sounded by means of leather or quill plectra.

"Educated only to work embroidery, to play on the spinet."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

Dumb-spinet: [MANICHOED.]

spin'-ët (2), s. [Lat. spinetum, from spina=a thorn.] A small wood or place overgrown with thorns and briars; a spinney.

"A Satyr, lodged in a little spinet."—Ben Jonson: The Satyr.

spin'-ët-ëd, a. [Eng. spinet (1); -ed.] Cleft, open, split. (Ascham.)

spin'-if-ër-ous, a. [Lat. spina=a thorn, a spine, and fero=to bear.] Bearing or producing thorns or spines; thorny.

spin'-i-form, a. [Lat. spina=a thorn, a spine, and forma=form.] Having the form of a spine or thorn.

†spi'-nig'-ër-i, s. pl. [Lat. spina=a spine, and gero=to bear or carry.]

Entom.: Spine-bearers; a division of Caterpillars in which they are armed with more or less branched spines, shed with every molt, but again renewed till the final one, when they disappear. Example, the caterpillars of Antiope, Io, and Atalanta. (Newman.)

spin'-ig'-ër-ous, a. [Latin spina=a thorn, a spine, and gero=to carry.] Bearing a spine or spines.

spin'-i-nëss, spin-i-ness, s. [English spiny; -ness.] The quality or state of being spiny.

"Their cold and bloodless spininess."—Chapman: Iliad, iii. (Comment.).

spink (1), spynke, s. [Sw. dial. spink; Gr. spingos=a finch.] A finch, a chaffinch.

"The spink chaunts sweetest in a hedge of thorns."—Harris.

spink (2), s. [Dut. pinkster bloem, from pinkster=Pentecost, at which the plant blooms.]

Bot.: Cardamine pratensis.

spin'-na-kër, s. [SPIN, v.]

Naut.: A jib-headed racing sail carried by yachts, set when running before the wind on the opposite side to the mainsail.

"Both hauled up spinnakers as they crossed the line."—Field, Oct. 3, 1885.

spin'-nër, s. [Eng. spin, v.; -er.]

1. One who or that which spins; one skilled in spinning.

2. A spinning-machine.

3. A garden-spider.

"Weaving spiders, come not here:

Hence, you long-legged spinnners, hence!"

Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

4. A spinneret (q. v.).

spin'-nër-ët', s. [Eng. spinner; dimin. suff. -et.]

Comparative Anatomy:

1. Any one of the mammillæ projecting from the arachnidium in Spiders. These mammillæ are little conical or cylindrical organs, four or six in number, through which the secretion of the glands of the arachnidium is passed, and molded into a proper thread-like shape for the formation of a web or line.

2. A tubular organ in the labium of caterpillars, communicating with two internal glands which furnish the silk from which the animal spins its cocoon.

spin'-nër-ule, subst. [Eng. spinner; dimin. suff. -ule.]

Compar. Anat.: One of the minute horny tubes which compose the spinneret in the Araneina.

spin'-nër-ÿ, s. [Eng. spinner; -y.] A spinning-mill.

spin'-neÿ, spin'-nÿ, subst. [O. Fr. espinoye (Fr. épinaye)=a thorny place, from Lat. spinetum.] [SPINET (2).] A small wood with undergrowth; a clump of trees; a small grove or shrubbery.

"The strip of grass land which lies between the spinneys and the farm."—Field, April 4, 1885.

spin'-ning, pr. par. or a. [SPIN, v.] spinning-head, s. A form of spinner in which the drawing and twisting mechanism are united in one head. This was the first form of spinning-machine, if we except the spinning-wheel. It was invented by Lewis Paul, and patented by him in 1738.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fáll, father; wê, wët, hère, camçl, hër, thêrc; pînc, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôa; mûte, cûb, cûre, unîto, cûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â. qu = kw.

spinning-house, s. A house of correction, so-called because women of loose character were obliged to spin or to beat hemp as a punishment. The House of Correction for offenders within the jurisdiction of Cambridge, England, is, or was till recently, so-called.

spinning-jenny, s. The name given by James Hargreaves to the spinning-machine invented by him in 1767. The name jenny is a corruption of engine, the term gin being a common local expression for a machine. It consisted of a number of spindles turned by a common wheel or cylinder worked by hand.

spinning-mill, subst. A mill or factory where spinning is carried on.

spinning-roller, s. A wheel in the drawing portion of a spinning-machine.

spinning-wheel, subst. A machine for spinning wool, cotton or flax into threads. It consists of a large wheel, band, and spindle, driven by foot or by hand. The wool is carded into rolls, which are twisted, drawn, and wound a length at a time, the wheel being turned periodically to twist the yarn. It was the first great improvement upon spinning by a distaff and spindle.

¶ At first spinning was performed by the spindle and the distaff. Representations of the process are on the Egyptian tombs. The spinning-wheel was invented in Nuremberg about 1530, and was introduced into England a few years after. In 1767 James Hargreaves invented the spinning-jenny, and Arkwright the spinning frame in 1769; then followed the mule jenny, invented by Crompton, in 1774-9.

spín'-nŷ (2), s. [SPINNEY.]

spín'-ōse, a. [SPINOUS.]

spín-ōs'-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. spinos(e); -ity.]

1. Lit.: The quality or state of being spinous or thorny.

*2. Fig.: Something thorny, harsh, or crabbed.

"He [Jeremy Taylor] could bear with the harshness and roughness of the schools, and was not unseen in their subtleties and spinosities."—Wood: Athenæ Oxon., vol. ii.

spī-nō-sō-, pref. [Lat. spinosus.] Spinous.

Bot.: Having teeth tipped with spines.

spín'-oūs, adj. [Latin spinosus, from spina= a thorn, a spine.]

1. Lit. & Bot.: Full of spines; armed with spines or thorns; thorny.

2. Fig.: Thorny, crabbed, sharp.

"Nor needeth it any spinous criticism for its explanation."—Mede: Works, disc. 4.

spinous-leaf, s.

Bot.: A leaf having its margin beset with spines, as in thistles.

spinous-loach, s.

Ichthy.: Cobitis tenia, a European species. It is about three inches long, and less valued for food than the Common Loach. [LOACH.]

spinous-process, s.

Anat.: A sharp projection, as of a vertebra or of the sphenoid bone. To the former Owen gave the name Neural-spine.

spinous-shark, s.

Ichthy.: Echinorhinus spinosus.

"The Spinous-shark is readily recognized by the short, bulky form of its body, short tail, and large spinous tubercles. It is evidently a ground shark, which probably lives at some depth, and but accidentally comes to the surface. More frequently met with in the Mediterranean, it has been found several times on the south coast of England and near the Cape of Good Hope."—Günther: Study of Fishes, p. 334.

spinous spider-crab, s.

Zoöl.: Maia squinado, common on the coasts of temperate Europe. The carapace is convex, spinous, and tuberculated, and grows somewhat triangular by the increase in length of the rostral portion.

Spī'-nō-zīsm, s. [See def.]

Hist. & Philos.: The monistic system of Baruch Despinosa (or Benedictus de Spinoza), a descendant of Portuguese Jews who had sought refuge in Holland from the cruelties of the Inquisition. He was born at Amsterdam (Nov. 24, 1632), and his father, an honorable but not very wealthy merchant, intended him for a theological career. His education was superintended by the Talmudist Saul Levi Morteira, but unsatisfied doubts kept him from the profession of a Jewish teacher, and his determined and continued refusal to attend the Synagogue gave such offense that in 1656 he was solemnly excommunicated. (The terrible formula is printed at length in Leves: Hist. Phil. (ed. 1880), ii. 167-71.) For a short time Spinoza became an assistant in a school kept by a physician named Vanden Ende, but he soon resigned this post and afterward maintained himself by the art of polishing lenses, which, in accordance with the Jewish custom of teaching every boy some trade or handicraft, he had learned in his youth, though this source of income was afterward increased by a small annuity settled on him by his friend De Vries. After a life of study, abstemiousness, and bodily and mental suffering, Spinoza died at the Hague (Feb. 21, 1677), at the age of forty-four. The system of Spinoza has been described as Atheism, as Pantheism, and as the most rigid Monotheism, according as his cardinal teaching—that there is only One Substance, God—has been interpreted. By Substance, however, Spinoza meant the underlying reality and ever-living existence, and he chose for the epigraph of his Ethics the words of St. Paul: "In Him we live, and move, and have our being" (Acts xvii. 28). God is for him the one principle, having Thought and Extension as two eternal and infinite attributes constituting its essence, of which attributes Mind and Matter are the necessary manifestations; and and thus he solves the problem of the relation of the Finite to the Infinite. Everything is a form of of the ever-living existence, the Substance, God, which is, and is not, Nature, with which He is no more to be confounded than the fountain with the rivulet or eternity with time. God is natura naturans, Nature is natura naturata; the one is the energy, the other is the act. In the same way he explains the union of the soul with the body. Man is but a mode of the Divine Existence; his mind a spark of the Divine Flame, his body a mode of the Infinite existence.

"Neither in Holland nor in Germany has there been a Spinozist, as there have been Cartesians, Kantists, and Hegelians, although German philosophy is in some sense saturated with Spinozism."—Lewes: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), ii. 211.

Spī'-nō-zīst, s. [SPINOZISM.] A supporter of or believer in the doctrines of Spinoza.

spín'-stēr, *spynn-stere, s. [A. S. spinnan=to spin; fem. suff. -estre, -ster.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A woman who spins or whose occupation is to spin; a spinner.

"The spinster's distaff stood unemployed."—Idler, No. 2.

¶ It was formerly applied also to a male spinner, as in Shakesp.: Henry VIII., i. 2.

*2. A woman of evil life or character; so called from their being obliged to spin in the House of Correction as a punishment. [SPINNING-HOUSE.]

"Many would never be wretched spinsters were they spinsters in deed, nor come to so public and shameful punishments if painfully employed in that vocation."—Fuller: Worthies of England; Kent.

II. Law: The common term for an unmarried woman.

¶ It is also used adjectively; as, a spinster aunt —i. e., unmarried.

spínstēr-hood, s. The quality or state of being a spinster.

spín'-strēss, s. [A double fem. from spin.] A spinster.

"A compound of gentleman and spinstress."—Gentleman Instructed, p. 149.

spín'-strŷ, s. [Eng. spinster; -y.] The business or occupation of spinning.

"What new decency can then be added by your spinstry?"—Milton: Reasons of Church Government, bk. ii., ch. ii.

spín'-tēxt, s. [Eng. spin, and text.] One who spins out sermons; a prosy preacher.

"The race of formal spintexts and solemn saygraces is nearly extinct."—Knox: Winter Evenings, Even. 9.

spín'-thēre, s. [Gr. spinthēr=a spark.]

Min.: The same as SEMELINE (q. v.).

spín'-ule, s. [Lat. spinula, dimin. from spina= a spine, a thorn.] A minute spine.

"The serrulations being composed of spinules."—Trans. Amer. Philos. Society (1873), p. 287.

spin-ū-lēs'-çent, a. [Mod. Lat. spinulescens, from Lat. spinula=a little thorn.]

Bot.: Having a tendency to produce small spines.

spín'-ū-lōse, †spín'-ū-loūs, adj. [Mod. Latin spinulosus, from spinula=a little thorn.]

Bot.: Covered with small spines.

spin-ū-lō-sō-, pref. [SPINULOSE.] Covered with small spines.

spinuloso-ciliate, a.

Bot.: Spinulose with fine spines.

spín'-ŷ, *spin-ie, *spin-ny, adj. [English spin(e); -y.]

I. Literally:

1. Full of or furnished with spines; thorny.

*2. Like a spine; hence, slender.

"Cold spinie grasshopper."

Chapman: Homer's Iliad, iii.

*II. Fig.: Thorny, perplexing, difficult, troublesome.

"So difficult and spinny an affair."—Digby: On Bodies.

spiny-finned fishes, s. pl.

Ichthy.: The Acanthopterygii (q. v.).

spiny-lobster, s.

Zoöl.: Palinurus vulgaris. [ROCK-LOBSTER.]

spiny-rat, s.

Zoöl.: The genus Echinomys, small rodents from the country east of the Andes and some of the West Indian islands. The fur is mixed with small spines, whence their scientific and popular name.

spī'-ō, subst. [Lat.=a sea nymph in the train of Cyrene.]

Zoölogy: The typical genus of Spionidæ (q. v.). Body long, slender, tapering, with sixty joints, terminating in two short styles; head with long cirri and two very long tentacles; eyes four; color pale, with pink cirri. It occupies a very slender tube composed of adventitious matter, slightly agglutinated, and placed on sertularian zoöphytes.

spī'-ōn, s. [O. Fr. espion.] A spy, a scout.

"Captain of the spions."—Heywood.

spī'-ōn'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spio, genit. spioni(s); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Tubicolæ (q. v.).

spīr'-ā, s. [Lat.]

Arch.: The base of a column. This member did not exist in the Doric order, but is always present in the Ionic and Corinthian. [See illustration under BASE (1), s.]

spīr'-ā-ble, a. [Lat. spirabilis, from spiro=to breathe.] Capable of being breathed; respirable.

"The spirable odor . . . ascending from it."—Nashe: Lenten Stuffe.

spīr'-ā-cle, *spyr-a-kle, s. [Fr. spiracle, from Latin spiraculum = an air-hole, from spiro = to breathe.] Any small hole, aperture, orifice, or vent in animal or vegetable bodies, by which air or other fluid is inhaled or exhaled. Applied to the breathing tubes of insects, the blowholes of cetaceans, &c.

spī-ræ'-ā, subst. [Latin, from Gr. spiræia=the meadow-sweet. (See def.)]

Botany: The typical genus of Spiræidæ (q. v.). Calyx inferior, equally five-cleft, persistent; petals five, roundish; follicles three to twelve, usually distinct, one-celled, two-valved, with few seeds. Known species fifty, from the temperate and cold parts of the northern hemisphere. Their roots have been used as a tonic. S. silicifolia, found in moist plantations, is not wild.

spiræa-oil, s. [SALICYLOL.]

spī-ræ'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. spiræ(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Rosacæ. Calyx tube herbaceous, fruit a ring of follicles, seeds not winged.

spī-ræ'-īn, subst. [Mod. Latin spiræ(a); -in (Chem.)]

Chem.: $C_{30}H_{30}O_{14}$ (?). A coloring mass extracted from the flowers of Spiræa ulmaria by ether. It is a yellow crystalline powder, insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, the solutions being of a deep green color when concentrated, yellow when dilute. Its alcoholic solution forms a yellow precipitate with baryta-water, crimson with lead acetate, dark green with ferrous salts, and black with ferric salts.

spīr'-āl (1), a. [SPIRE (1), s.] Pointed or shaped like a spire.

spīr'-āl (2), a. & s. [Fr., from Lat. spiralis, from spira=a coil, a twist, a wreath; Sp. espiral; Ital. spirale.] [SPIRE (2), s.]

A. As adjective:

1. Winding about a fixed point or center, and continually receding from it, like a watch-spring.

"Some watches have strings and physies, and others none; some have the balance loose, and others regulated by a spira spring, and others by hogs' bristles."—Locke: Human Understand., bk. iii., ch. vi.

2. Winding about a cylinder or other round body, and at the same time rising or advancing forward.

"From this a be, or round body, was formed, by which the water, or air, or both, was carried in a spiral stream up to the clouds."—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. i., ch. vi.

B. As substantive:

1. Geom.: A curve which may be generated by a point moving along a straight line, in the same direction, according to any law, while the straight line revolves uniformly about a fixed point, always continuing in the same plane. The portion generated during one revolution is called a Spire. The moving point is the generatrix of the curve, the fixed point is the pole of the spiral, and the distance from the pole to any position of the generatrix bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çcil, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şūn; -tīon, -şion = zhūn. -tious, -ciious, -sious = şūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

is the radius vector of that point. The law according to which the generatrix moves along the revolving line is the law of the spiral, and determines the nature of the curve. Any position of the revolving line, assumed at pleasure, is called the initial line. Spirals are known by the names of their inventors, or by terms derived from the properties by which they are characterized; as, the spiral of Archimedes, hyperbolic spirals, logarithmic spirals, parabolic spirals, &c.

2. A helix or curve which winds round a cylinder like a screw.

spiral-bit, s. A wood-boring tool, made of a twisted bar of metal, with a hollow axis.

spiral pipe-oven, s.

Metall.: An arrangement for heating air for the blast furnace, consisting of a long spiral of cast-iron pipes, connected with each other by cemented socket joints, through which the air to be heated circulates.

spiral-pump, s. A form of the Archimedean screw water-elevator, consisting of a pipe coiled spirally round an inclined axis.

spiral-screw, s. A screw formed upon a conical or conoidal core.

spiral-spring, s. A coil whose rounds have the same diameter, and which is generally utilized by compression or extension in the line of its axis.

Spiral-spring coupling: A coupling for a pair of shafts meeting at an angle. The ends of the spiral connect to the respective shafts and make a bent coupling.

spiral-vessels, s. pl.

Bot.: Membranous tubes with conical extremities, their interior occupied by a fiber twisted spirally, and capable of unrolling with elasticity. Called also Tracheæ. They are designed for the transmission of air. When formed by the convolutions of a single spire they are called Simple, when by those of many turning in the same direction they are called Compound.

spiral-wheels, s. pl.

Mach.: A species of gearing which serves the same purpose as bevel-wheels, and is better adapted for light machinery. The teeth are formed upon the circumferences of cylinders of the required diameter, at an angle with their respective axes, when the direction of the motion is to be changed. By this construction the teeth become in fact small portions of screws or spirals winding round the cylinders. Wheels of this kind are used when the two shafts require to pass each other; when the shafts are in the same plane bevel-wheels are employed.

spi-rāl'-i-tŷ, s. [Eng. spiral (2); -ity.] The quality or state of being spiral.

spīr'-al-lŷ, adv. [English spiral (2); -ly.] In a spiral form or direction; in the manner of a screw.

"The sides are composed of two orders of fibers running circularly or spirally from base to tip."—Ray: On the Creation.

spīr'-ant, s. [Lat. spirans, pr. par. of spiro = to breathe.] A consonant in the articulation of which the breath is not wholly stopped, the articulating organs being so modified as to allow the sound to be prolonged, a continuous consonant, such as h, th, f, v, &c.

spī-rān'-thēs, subst. [Gr. speira = a spire, and anthos = a flower. Named from the twisted inflorescence.]

Bot.: Lady's Tresses; the typical genus of Spiranthis. Spike of small flowers in one to three spirally-twisted rows; sepals and petals similar, the former gibbous at base, upper part adnate to the petals, forming a tube round the lip; pollen masses four, powdery; stigma discoid. Known species forty-six, from tropical and temperate countries. Three are European: Spiranthes autumnalis, S. aestivalis, and S. romanzoviana.

spī-rān'-thī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spiranthes], and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Arctothecæ.

spī-rān'-thŷ, spei-rān'-thŷ, s. [SPIRANTHES.]

Bot.: The occasional twisted growth of the parts of a flower.

spī-rā'-tion, s. [Latin spiratio, from spiratus, pa. par. of spiro = to breathe.] The act of breathing.

"To other substances, void of corporeal bulk and concretion, the name of spirit is assigned to imply the manner of their origin, because God did, by a kind of spiration, produce them."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. xxxiv.

spīre (1), spir, s. [A. S. spīr; cogn. with Icel. spīra = a spar, a stilt; Dan. spire = a germ, a sprout; Sw. spira = a scepter, a pistil; Ger. spiere = a spar.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A stalk or blade of grass or other plant.

"Bot yf that sed that sowen is, in the sloh sterve Shall nevere spir springen up, ne spik on strawe curne." Piers Plowman, c. xiii. 180.

2. A body which shoots up to a point; a tapering, conical, or pyramidal body. [II. 1.]

"On the shrine he heaped a spire Of burning sweets." Keats: Endymion, i. 223.

*3. The top or uttermost part of anything; the summit.

"To the spire and top of praises vouch'd." Shakesp.: Coriolanus, i. 9.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The tapering portion of a steeple rising above the tower; a steeple; a structure of pyramidal or conical form surmounting a church or cathedral. The earliest spires, specimens of which still exist in Norman architecture, were merely pyramidal.

Spires.

a. Tower and Spire, Than Church, near Caen (A. D. 1080). b. Turret and Spire, St. Peter's, Oxford (A. D. 1160). c. Turret and Spire, Rochester Cathedral (A. D. 1160). d. Tower and Broach Spire, Almondsbury Church, Gloucestershire (A. D. 1250). e. Tower and Spire, Chichester Cathedral (A. D. 1337). f. Tower and Spire, St. Dunstan's Church, near the Custom House (one of Sir Christopher Wren's churches, built about A. D. 1680).

ical or conical roofs. The spires in mediæval buildings are generally square, octagonal, or circular in plan, are sometimes hollow and sometimes solid, and are variously ornamented with bands or panels. The angles are sometimes crocketed, and the spire almost invariably terminates in a finial. When a spire rises from the exterior of the wall of the tower without the intervention of a parapet, it is called a Broach (q. v.).

"All the spires and towers from Greenwich to Chelsea made answer."—Macaulay: Hist. of Eng., ch. xxii.

2. Bot.: (1) Phragmites communis, called also Spire-reed; (2) Phalaris arundinacea; (3) Psamma arenaria.

3. Mining: The tube carrying the train to the charge in the blast-hole. So called from spires of grass or rushes used for the purpose.

Arch.: The window of a spire.

spire-reed, s.

Bot.: Phragmites communis.

Arch.: The portion of a steeple formed by the spire.

spīre (2), s. [Fr., from Lat. spira = a coil, a twist, a wreath, from Gr. speira = a coil, a wreath.]

1. That portion of a spiral which is generated during one revolution of the straight line revolving about the pole. Every spiral consists of an infinite number of spires. A winding line like the threads of a screw; anything wreathed or twisted; a curl, a twist, a wreath.

2. A term applied collectively to the convolutions of a spiral shell, which are placed above the lowest or body whorl, whatever shape it may assume.

Zoöl.: Any individual of the family Spiriferidæ (q. v.)

spīre (1), spyer, spyre, v. i. & t. [SPIRE (1), s.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To shoot; to shoot up in manner of a pyramid.

"Suddenly a flame

Spired from the fragrant smoke."

Landor: Gebir, bk. ii.

2. To sprout, as grain in malting.

B. Trans.: To shoot out.

"Would [have] spired forth fruit of more perfection."—Spenser: Ruines of Time. (Dedic.)

spīre (2), v. i. [Lat. spiro.] To breathe.

spīred, a. [Eng. spire (1), s.; -ed.] Having a spire or steeple.

"Whose steeple's Gothic pride Or pinnacled or spīr'd would boldly rise," spīr'-ī-fēr, s. [SPIRIFERÆ.] Any individual of the genus Spirifera.

Mason: English Garden, bk. iii.

spī-rīf-ēr-ā, s. [Lat. spira = a coil, and fero = to bear.]

Palæont.: A genus of Spiriferidæ, with numerous species, beginning in the Lower Silurian and ending in the Permian, or, according to Woodward, ranging into the Triassic. Shell impunctate, valves articulated by teeth and sockets; hinge-line long and straight, hinge-area divided across in each valve by a triangular A. Ventral valve. B. Dorsal valve, showing calcareous spires for the support of the arms.

closed, partially or completely, by a pseudo-deltidium, in the dorsal occupied by the cardinal process). Woodward reckons three sub-genera: Cyrtia, Suessia, and Spiriferina.

spīr'-ī-fēr'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spirifer(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A family of Brachiopoda, ranging from the Lower Silurian to the Lias. Animal free when adult, or rarely attached by a muscular peduncle; the shell punctated or non-punctated; arms greatly developed, and entirely supported upon a thin, shelly, spirally-rolled lamella. [SPIRIFERÆ.] Woodward enumerates four genera, to which Tate adds eight others.

spīr'-īf-ēr'-ī-nā, s. [Mod. Lat. spirifer(a) (q. v.); Lat. fem. sing. adj. suff. -ina.]

Palæont.: A sub-genus of Spirifera. Known species twenty-nine, from the Carboniferous to the Lower Oolite. Found in many parts of Europe.

spīr'-il-lī'-nā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from spira = a spire.]

1. Zoöl. The typical genus of Spirillinidea. Test coiled into a flat spiral.

2. Palæont.: Two species from the Permian and one from the Upper Chalk of Britain.

spīr'-il-līn-id-ē-ā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from spirillina (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: A family of Perforate Foraminifera, having a glassy, finely-porous, calcareous test.

spī-rīl'-lūm, s. [Mod. Lat. dimin. spira = a coil.]

Biology: 1. A genus or class of bacteria including all of a spiral or twisted form. 2. An individual of the genus Spirillum.

spīr'-it, spīr-ite, spīr-yt, spyr-yt, s. [O. Fr. esprit (Fr. esprit), from Lat. spiritum, accus. of spiritus = breath, spirit, from spiro = to breathe; Sp. espíritu; Port. espírito; Ital. spirito. Spirit and sprite are doublets.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Breath; the breath of life; hence, life itself, vital power, vitality.

"Now my spirit is going; I can no more."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 15.

*2. A breath of air; air, wind.

"All purges have in them a raw spirit, or wind, which is the principal cause of tension in the stomach."—Bacon.

3. Immaterial intelligence; intelligence conceived of apart from any physical organization or material embodiment.

"If we seclude space, there will remain in the world but matter and mind, or body and spirit."—Watts: Logic.

4. The intelligent, immaterial and immortal part of man; the soul, as distinguished from the body.

5. A disembodied soul; the soul after it has left the body.

"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."—Eccles. xii. 7.

6. A specter, an apparition, a ghost.

7. A supernatural being; a sprite, demon, angel, fairy, elf, or the like.

"Sent by some spirit to mortals good, Or th' unseen genius of the wood."

Milton: Il Penseroso, 151.

8. A person considered with regard to his peculiar characteristics of mind or temper, especially a man of life, fire, or enterprise.

"The choice and master spirits of their age."

Shakesp.: Julius Cæsar, iii. 1.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, there; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

9. Genius, vigor of mind or intellect.

"The noblest spirit or genius cannot deserve enough of mankind, to pretend to the esteem of heroic virtue."—Temple.

10. Vivacity, animation, fire, courage, ardor, enthusiasm, vigor, or the like. (Often in the plural.)

"More alert my spirits rise,
And my heart is free and light."

Cowper: Watching unto God.

11. Temper or disposition of mind, mood, humor, mental condition, character, or nature. (Often in plural, as, to be in good or low spirits.)

"The whole spirit of the assembly had undergone a change."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

12. Real meaning or intent, as opposed to the letter or literal statement.

"But they began to perceive that it was at direct variance with the spirit of the constitution."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

13. That which pervades and tempers the whole nature of a thing; the active, vital, or essential part of anything; essence, quintessence, actuating principle.

"Do not kill

The spirit of love with a perpetual dullness."

Shakesp.: Sonnet 56.

14. Tenuous, volatile, airy, or vapory substances of active qualities.

"All bodies have spirits and pneumatical parts within them."—Bacon.

15. A liquid obtained by distillation, especially alcohol, the spirit or spirits of wine, from which it was originally distilled.

"In general, they give the name of spirit to any distilled volatile liquor."—Boyle.

16. (Pl.): Distilled liquors, such as brandy, rum, gin, whisky, &c., containing much alcohol, as distinguished from malt liquors or wine; as, to take a glass of spirits.

17. A solution of tin in an acid. (Used in dyeing.)

*18. An aspirate, a breathing, as the letter h.

"Be it letter or spirit, we have a great use for it in our tongue."—Ben Jonson: English Grammar.

II. Pharm. (pl.): Solutions in spirit of the volatile principles of plants, prepared by macerating for a few days the bruised seeds, flowers, leaves, &c., in rectified or in proof spirit, and distilling at a gentle heat. Many of the spirits of pharmacy are prepared by simply dissolving the essential oil of the plant in spirit of the prescribed strength. They are employed medicinally as aromatics and stimulants.

- (3) Rectified spirit: [RECTIFIED-SPIRIT.]
- (4) The Spirit, the Holy Spirit: The Holy Ghost (q. v.).

spirit-circle, s. A spirit-séance (q. v.).

"The souls of Strauss and Carl Vogt, as well as of Augustine and Jerome, are summoned by mediums to distant spirit-circles."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 143.

spirit-color, s. A style of calico-printing produced by a mixture of dye-extracts and solution of tin, commonly called spirit by dyers. The colors are brilliant but fugitive.

spirit-duck, s.

Ornith.: Clangula albeola, from North America. Head and neck golden green, a patch on the head, one behind the eyes, the lower part of the neck, the breast and belly white, the rest dusky white.

spirit-hand, s. A form of spirit-manifestation in which phosphorescent hands, said to be those of spirits, are visible.

"We had . . . spirit-hands touching us."—The Medium, Feb. 9, 1872.

spirit-lamp, s. A lamp burning alcohol. Used for many purposes in the arts where heat rather than light is required.

spirit-leaf, spirit-weed, s.

Bot.: Cryphiacanthus barbadensis; called also Ruellia tuberosa.

Spirit-level, s. An instrument used for determining a line or plane parallel to the horizon, and also the relative heights of two or more stations. It consists of a glass tube nearly filled with alcohol, preferably colored. The remaining space in the tube is a bubble of air, and this occupies a position exactly in the middle of the tube when the latter is perfectly horizontal. The tube is mounted on a wooden bar, which is laid on a beam or other object to be tested; or it is mounted on a telescope or theodolite, and forms the means of bringing these instruments to a level, the slightest deviation from the horizontal position being indicated by the bubble rising toward the higher end of the tube.

Spirit-level quadrant: An instrument furnished with a spirit-level and used for taking altitudes.

spirit-manifestations, s. pl. A generic term for all the mysterious phenomena said to take place through the intervention of spirits in the presence of mediums.

"I am well aware that the problem of the so-called spirit-manifestations is one to be discussed on its merits, in order to arrive at a distinct opinion how far it may be concerned with facts insufficiently appreciated and explained by science, and how far with superstition, delusion, and sheer knavery."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 142.

spīr'-it-u-āl-izm, s. [Eng. spiritual; -ism.]

*1. The state of being spiritual; spiritual character; religiosity.

"Prudential secularism had superseded the fanatical spiritualism of the preceding age."—Fraser: Berkeley, p. 117.

2. Hist.: A system of professed communication with the unseen world, chiefly through persons called mediums. It is asserted that spirits manifest their presence by raps, by unfastening knots, by transportation of furniture and human beings through the air, by the turning and tilting of tables, by writing on slates, playing on musical instruments, imparting phosphorescence to certain objects, and, in some cases, by becoming partly or entirely materialized in human form. The first rappings are said to have been heard in April, 1848, in a house in Acadia, New York, inhabited by a Mr. Fox, and his daughters afterward became mediums and gave public sances in various towns in the United States. About 1852 American mediums went to London, and their claims were strictly investigated. In 1855 Mr. D. D. Home visited England, and afterward the continent of Europe, where he is said to have shown his powers before many sovereigns, and to have strongly impressed Napoleon III. with their supernatural character. Since that time spiritualism has developed into a cult, and many persons have professed to believe in it, and to derive consolation from its teachings. Its opponents urge that two extremely suspicious circumstances attend so-called spirit-manifestations: That they always take place in the dark, and that the presence of a determined unbeliever is sufficient to prevent them. Moreover, it is indisputable that in some cases actual frauds have been practiced by mediums, and many of the manifestations have been imitated by professional conjurers. Tylor (Primitive Culture, ch. iv.) looks upon spiritualism as a survival, and says:

"Our own time has revived a group of beliefs and practices which have their roots deep in the very stratum of early philosophy where witchcraft makes its first appearance. This group of beliefs and practices constitutes what is now commonly known as spiritualism."

The system, however, is not without defenders; several newspapers and monthly magazines in America and England are devoted to its interests, and it has a voluminous and increasing literature. The Spiritual Magazine, their most important foreign publication, has as its motto:

"Spiritualism is based on the cardinal fact of spirit communion and influx; it is the effort to discover all truth relating to man's spiritual nature, capacities, relations, duties, welfare, and destiny; and its application to a regenerate life. It recognizes a continuous divine inspiration in man; it aims, through a careful reverent study of facts, at a knowledge of the laws and principles which govern the occult forces of the universe; of the relations of spirit to matter and of man to God and the spiritual world. It is thus catholic and progressive, leading to true religion as at one with the highest philosophy."

3. Philos.: A wide term embracing all systems which are not Materialist; that is, which hold that Mind is not a function of, but something distinct from Matter [MATERIALISM], or which deny the existence of Matter. Thus the term covers all systems recognizing the existence of Mind and Matter, as well as those which, like the Idealism of Berkeley and the Egoism of Fichte, regard the external world as a succession of notions impressed on the mind by the Deity, or as the educt of the mind itself.

spīr'-it-u-āl-ist, s. & a. [Eng. spiritual; -ist.]

A. As substantive:

*1. One who professes a regard for spiritual things only; one whose employment is spiritual.

"There's some siller in the spleuchan that's like the Captain's ain."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. i.

splīce, v. t. [O. Dnt. spleisen=to weave or lace two ends together, as of a rope, from splitsen=to splice, from spljten=to split (q. v.); Dan. splidse splidse=to splice, from splitte=to split.]

1. Lit.: To unite or join together, as two ropes, or two parts of a rope, so as to make a continuous length by interweaving the strands of the ends; also, to unite or join together, by overlapping, as two pieces of timber, metal, or the like.

2. Fig.: To marry. (Said of the person by whom the ceremony is performed.) (Slang.)

¶ (1) To get spliced: To get married.

(2) To splice the main brace: To serve out an extra glass of grog to sailors in case of extra exertion, severe weather, &c.; hence, to take a dram.

splīce, s. [SPLICE, v.]

I. Literally:

1. Mach., &c.: The uniting of two pieces of timber, metal, or the like.

2. Naut.: The joint by which two ropes are united so as to make one continuous length, or the two ends of a single rope are united, to form a grommet or eye.

"In the short splice (a, b), used for ropes which are not to be rove through blocks, the strands are unlaid for a convenient length, and each passed over one and under another of its corresponding strands on the opposite rope for a sufficient distance. The ends are then drawn taut, usually trimmed off close, and frequently the splice is covered by serving. The long splice, for ropes which are to pass through blocks, is formed by unlaid the strands for a longer distance, and laying two belonging to each rope in the scores formed by unlaid the opposite strands of the other. This distributes the joining over a considerable length, rendering the enlargement scarcely perceptible. The long-rolling splice is used for lead-lines, fishing-lines, &c. The cut or cant splice (c) is made by cutting a piece from a rope, and laying open the ends of the strands, which are passed in between the strands of the piece to which it is to be attached. The ring-splice (d) and the eye-splice (e) are made in a similar way."—Knight: Dict. of Mechanics, s. v. Splice.

Splices.

II. Fig.: Marriage. (Slang.)

Rope-making: One of the parts of a rope-making machine. Each spole-frame has apparatus for determining the torsion and tension of each strand, and a cluster of three spole-frames combines the three strands into a rope.

spō'-lī-ā ō-pī-mā, s. pl. [Lat.] Originally the spoils taken by a general from the general of the opposite side, when he had slain him in single combat; the most valuable spoil taken from an enemy; any valuable booty or spoil.

spō'-lī-ā-rŷ, s. [Lat. spoliarium.]

Roman Antiq.: The place in a Roman amphitheater, where the slaughtered gladiators were dragged, and where their clothes were stripped from their bodies.

spō'-lī-āte, v. t. & i. [Lat. spoliatus, pa. par. of spolio=to spoil (q. v.).]

A. Trans.: To plunder, to pillage, to rob, to despoil.

"Spoliate their church and betray their king."—B. Disraeli: Sybil, bk. i., ch. lii.

B. Intrans.: To practice plundering; to pillage.

spō'-lī-ā'-tion, s. [Lat. spoliatio, from spoliatus, pa. par. of spolio=to spoil (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of plundering; robbery, plunder.

2. The act or practice of plundering in time of war, especially of plundering neutrals at sea under authority.

II. Eccles. Law: (See extract.)

"Spoliation is an injury done by one clerk or incumbent to another, in taking the fruits of his benefice without any right thereunto, but under a pretended title."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 7.

¶ Writ of spoliation:

Law: A writ obtained by a party to a suit in the ecclesiastical courts, suggesting that his adversary has wasted the fruits of a benefice, or has received them to the prejudice of the rightful owner.

spō'-lī-ā-tive, adj. [SPOLIATE.] Tending to take away or diminish; formerly used in medicine of anything that served to lessen the mass of the blood.

spō'-lī-ā-tōr, s. [Lat.] One who commits spoliation.

spō'-lī-ā-tōr-ŷ, adj. [English spoliat(e); -ory.] Consisting in spoliation; causing spoliation; destructive.

spōn-dā'-īc, spōn-dā'-īc-āl, spōn-dā'-īck, a. [Lat. spondaicus, from spondeus=a spondee; Fr. spondaïque.]

1. Of or pertaining to a spondee; denoting two long feet in meter. (Rambler, No. 94.)

2. Composed of spondees in excess; as, a spondaic hexameter. [HEXAMETER.]

spōn'-dāl, s. [A corrupt. of spondyl (q. v.).] A joint or joining of two pieces.

spōn'-deē, s. [Latin spondeus, spondæus, from Gr. spondeios=a spondee, from spondai=libations, a solemn treaty or truce, so called because slow, solemn melodies, chiefly in spondaic meter, were used at such ceremonies; Fr. spondée.]

Pros.: A poetic foot of two long syllables.

spōn-dī-ā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [SPONDIEÆ.]

spōn'-dī-ās, s. [Gr. spondias, spodias=a bul-lace tree.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Anacardiaceæ (q. v.). Leaves alternate, without dots; carpels surrounded by a cup-shaped disk, and five in number, each one-celled with a pendulous seed. The fruit of various West Indian and South American species, as Spondias purpurea, and S. mombin [HOG-PLUM], are eaten, so is that of S. dulcis or cytherea (the Otaheite apple) in the Society Islands. The great fleshy kernel of S. birrea is eaten in Abyssinia. An intoxicating drink is manufactured from it by the negroes of Senegal. The bark of S. venulosa is an aromatic astringent given in diarrhoea, &c. The juice of the fruit of S. tuberosa is drunk in Brazil in fevers. A species, S. mangifera, called by Anglo-Indians Hog-plum, grows in India. The pulp is given in bilious dyspepsia, the bark as a refrigerant. It is also used in dysentery, and the juice of the leaves in earache. The gum is somewhat like that of gum arabic, but darker.

spōn-dī-ē'-æ, spōn-dī-ā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spondi(as); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ, -aceæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Anacardiaceæ; ovary two to five celled, instead of being reduced by abortion to a single cell. Some botanists elevate it into a distinct order.

spōn'-dū-lic, spōn'-doo-lic, spōn'-dū-lāc, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A term for money. Probably a corruption of the Greek word spondylos=vertebra; hence, fig., to have spondulics is to have financial backbone. (Slang.)

spōn'-dŷl, spōn'-dŷle, spōn-dil, subst. [Lat. spondylus; Gr. spondylos; Fr. spondile.]

Anat.: A joint of the backbone; a vertebra.

"His whole frame slackens; and a kind of rack Runs down along the spondils of 'is back."

Ben Jonson: Saa Shepherd, ii. 2.

spōn-dŷl'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spondyl(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Asiphonida, generally merged in Ostreidæ.

spōn'-dŷ-lūs, s. [Latin, from Gr. spondylos=a vertebra.]

Zool. & Palæontol.: Thorny Oyster; a genus of Ostreidæ (Woodward), of Pectinidæ (Tate), formerly made the type of the family Spondylidæ, with sixty-eight recent species, widely distributed in coral reefs. Shell irregular, with divergent ribs, terminating in foliaceous spines, attached to foreign bodies by right-valve; umbones wide apart and eared; lower valve with triangular hinge-area; two hinge-teeth in each valve. Animal like that of Pecten (q. v.). Water cavities are common in the inner layer, the border of the mantle having deposited shell more rapidly than the umbonal portion. Eighty fossil species, from the carboniferous onward. (Woodward.) Other authorities make it commence in the Jurassic.

spone, s. [SPOON.]

spōng, s. [Etym. doubtful.] An irregular, narrow, and projecting part of a field. (Prov.)

"The tribe of Judah with a narrow spong confined on the kingdom of Edom."—Fuller: Pisgah Sight, pt. ii., bk. iv., ch. ii.

spōnge, spounge, spūnge, s. [O. Fr. esponge (French éponge), from Lat. spongia; Gr. sponggia, sponggos=a sponge; Lat. fungus=a fungus (q. v.); Sp. & Port. esponja; Ital. spugna, spogna.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The fibrous framework of any species of Spongia (q. v.). It is soft, light, and porous, easily compressible, readily absorbing fluids, and giving them out again on compression. Sponges are used for many domestic purposes: The finer qualities for the bath and toilet, and the coarser for washing paint-work, carriages, &c. Mattresses are sometimes stuffed with sponge, which is also employed as a filter and as a polishing material for fine surfaces. Sponges are obtained either by diving, or by tearing them from the rocks with a long pole. The former method is adopted for the better class of sponges. They are prepared for market by soaking them in dilute hydrochloric acid to cleanse them and remove adherent particles of carbonate of lime.

"Then with a sponge he drest
His face all over."

Chapman: Homer's Iliad, xviii

(2) Any sponge-like substance, as, in baking-dough before it is kneaded and formed, when it is full of globules of carbonic acid generated by the yeast or leaven.

2. Figuratively: One who pertinaciously lives upon others; a parasite, a sponger.

II. Technically:

1. Manège: The extremity or point of a horse-shoe, answering to the heel.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhñ; -ñion, -şion = zhñ. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

2. Metallurgy:

(1) Iron in soft or pasty condition, as delivered in a ball from the puddling-furnace.

(2) Iron ore reduced, but not melted, preserving its former shape, but porous and lighter by the removal of foreign matters.

(3) Platinum sponge (q. v.).

(4) The gold remaining from the parting process, after the silver has been dissolved by nitric acid from the alloy of gold and silver.

(5) Silver in a partly reduced condition, ready for refining.

3. Ordn.: A kind of mop for cleaning the bore of a cannon after a discharge.

4. Pharm.: Formerly burnt sponge was much given in goiter and strumous glandular swellings; but the iodine and bromine, from which it derived its value, are now administered in other forms.

5. Zoöl.: Any species of the genus Spongia, and popularly the three most commonly used—viz., Euspongia officinalis, the fine Turkey or Levant Sponge; E. zimocca, the Hard Zimocca Sponge, and Hippospongia equina, the Horse Spunge or common Bath Sponge. In the first, found in the Mediterranean and in the West Indies, the chief fibers are of different thicknesses, irregularly swollen at intervals, and cored by sand grains, while the uniting fibers are soft, thin, and elastic. In the second the chief fibers are thinner, more regular, and almost free from sand, while the uniting fibers are denser and thicker. The third has very generally a thick, cake-like form. The Yellow and Hard-headed Sponges of the American shores resemble S. zimocca; some at least of the Wool Sponges belong to Hippospongia gossypina, and the Velvet Sponge to H. meandriiformis.

¶ To throw up the sponge: A phrase taken from prize-fighting, where the loser's seconds throw the sponge into the air in acknowledgement of the defeat of their man; hence, to give in as beaten, to acknowledge one's self beaten. (Colloq. or Slang.) sponge-cake, s. A kind of sweet cake, so called from its light, spongy character.

sponge-crab, s. [DROMIA.]

sponge-fisher, subst. A person engaged in the sponge-fishery; one who dives for sponges.

sponge-fishery, s. The act or occupation of diving for sponges.

"The number of men employed in the Ottoman sponge-fishery is between 4,000 and 5,000."—Chamber's Encyc., ix, 57.

Bot.: Polytrichum commune.

sponge-particles, s. pl.

Zoöl.: The ultimate components of the living substance of a sponge. Each is similar to an amoeba, and contains a nucleus. Called also Sarcoid.

Surg.: A tent for dilating wounds. It is formed by dipping sponge into hot wax plaster, and pressing it till cold between two iron plates. It is then cut into pieces.

sponge-tree, s.

Bot.: Acacia farnesiana.

spōnge, spūnge, v. t. & i. [Sponge, s.]

A. Transitive:

I. Literally:

1. To cleanse or wipe with a sponge.

"To load and sponge out so huge a piece of cannon."—London Daily Telegraph.

2. To wipe out with a sponge, as letters or writing; to obliterate; to destroy all traces of.

"So that, except between the words of translation and the minds of scripture itself, there be contradiction, every little difference should not seem an intolerable Polish necessarily to be spunged out."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity, bk. v., § 19.

II. Figuratively:

1. To drain; to harass by extortion; to squeeze, to plunder.

"How came such a multitude of our own nation to be spunged of their plate and money?"—South: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 12.

2. To gain by sponging or sycophantic arts.

"Here went the dean, when he's to seek,
To spunge a breakfast once a week."
Swift. (Todd).

B. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To suck in, as a sponge.

2. Fig.: To live upon others; to live by or practice mean arts.

"He . . . had no business to come sponging on Mr. King."—Chambers' Journal, July, 1879, p. 408.

spōnge-lēt, s. [Eng. sponge; dimin. suff. -let.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A little sponge.

2. Bot.: A spongiolate (q. v.).

spōng'-eoūs, a. [Eng. sponge; -ous.] Resembling a sponge; like a sponge; of the nature of a sponge; full of small pores.

"For which purpose, spongeous it [the lights] is and full of hollow pipes within."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xi., ch. xxv.

spōng'-ēr, spūng'-ēr, s. [Eng. spong(e); -er.]

1. Lit.: One who sponges; one who uses a sponge.

2. Fig.: One who sponges on others; a parasite.

"A generous rich man, that kept a splendid and open table, would try which were friends, and which only trencher-flies, and spungers."—L'Esrange.

spōn'-gī-ā, s. [Latin, from Greek spongia=a sponge.]

1. Zoöl.: The Linnæan name for the modern class Spongida, now its typical genus (q. v.). Skeleton irregular in form; soft, elastic, very porous, the internal canals with external orifices. No earthy spicules. [SPONGE.]

2. Palæont.: From the Great Oolite onward.

spōn'-gī-dā, spōn'-gī-dæ, spōn'-gī-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., formed from spongia (q. v.).]

1. Zoöl.: A class of Protozoa. Though not the lowest animals in organization, they were once relegated by some zoologists to the vegetable kingdom, but the botanists repudiated them, and with justice. They are essentially multicellular animals, in which the endodermal layers consist partly or wholly of flagellated collared cells. Most of them have a horny skeleton, composed of fibers, strengthened by siliceous or calcareous spicules (q. v.). The animal is of a gelatinous substance, investing the fibers of the skeleton during life, and traversed by canals connected directly or indirectly with the surface of the skeleton by many minute and a few larger apertures. The gelatinous part consists of an outer superficial layer of sponge particles. The inferior layer is of similar composition. The two are separated by a wide cavity communicating with the exterior by minute holes in the superficial layer; it is filled with water. In the floor of the cavity are many apertures, leading into canals, which ramify in the deep layer, and end in the floors of lofty funnels or craters. At the top of these are large exhalant apertures called oscules, whence currents proceed, while other currents set into the sponge by many minute holes, called pores or inhalant apertures. The pores bring in nutriment, while the oscules carry off excrementitious matter. They may also constitute an incipient breathing apparatus. Two reproductive processes exist—one asexual, the other sexual. Nearly all sponges are marine. They occur more or less in every sea, and vary in size from a pin's head to four or even six feet high, and the same broad, but are largest and most numerous in the tropics. "They are massive, incrusting, sessile, or stalked, globular, branched, tree-like, with the branches free or united laterally into a network; lamellar, irregularly or fan-shaped; tubular, vase-form, or labyrinthic, many of the forms presenting a close parallelism to corals." (Sollas.) Orders: Myxospongiæ, Calcispongiæ, Silicispongiæ, and Cerospongiæ. [SPONGE, SPONGIA.]

2. Palæont.: From the Cambrian (?), or the Silurian (?), onward. Vitreous sponges occur abundantly in the Chalk.

spōng'-i-form, a. [Eng. sponge, and form.] Resembling a sponge; sponge-like; soft and porous, like a sponge.

spongiform-quartz, s. [SPONGY-QUARTZ.]

spōn'-gīl-lā, s. [Lat., dimin. from spongia.]

1. Zoöl.: The typical genus of Spongillina, and the only one of which the species inhabit fresh water. They are green or gray.

2. Palæont.: From the Upper Oolite.

spōn'-gīl-lī-nā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spongill(a); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Zoöl.: A sub-family of Renierinæ or Renieridæ. Reproduction by ova and by winter-eggs or statoblasts.

spōng'-in, s. [Eng. sponge; -in (Chem.).]

Chem.: An insoluble substance obtained from sponge by treating it with ether, alcohol, water, hydrochloric acid, and dilute soda-ley. It closely resembles fibroin, but is insoluble in an ammoniacal solution of copper, and, when boiled with sulphuric acid, yields leucine, but not tyrosine.

spōng'-i-ness, subst. [Eng. spongy; -ness.] The quality or state of being spongy.

spōng'-īng, pr. par. or a. [SPONGE, v.] sponging-house, spunging-house, s. A house or tavern where persons arrested for debt were lodged for twenty-four hours, before being put into prison, to allow their friends an opportunity of settling the debt. They were usually the private dwellings of the bailiffs. (Eng.)

"From all the brothels, gambling-houses, and spunging-houses of London, false witnesses poured forth to swear away the lives of Roman Catholics."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

spōn'-gī-ō-car'-pī-dæ, spōn'-gī-ō-car'-pē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. spongiocarp(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ, -eæ.]

Bot.: A family of Cryptonemæ (Lindley); an order of Rose-spored Algæ (Berkeley).

spōn'-gī-ō-car'-pūs, s. [Gr. spongia=a sponge, and karpōs=fruit.]

Bot.: The single genus of Spongiocarpidæ (q. v.). Called also Polyides.

spōng'-ī-ōle, s. [Latin spongiolus=a kind of fungus, dimin. from spongia (q. v.).]

Bot.: The young tender extremity of a root by which fluid food is absorbed from the earth. It was once believed to be the growing and absorbing point of the root. This is now known to be just behind the apex. Called also a Spongelet.

"The effect of this pruning is to increase the number of fibers and spongiolæ."—Scribner's Magazine, April, 1880, p. 826.

Palæont.: The fossil spicule of a sponge. (Dana.)

spōn'-gī-ō-pī'-line, s. [Gr. spongia=a sponge, and pilos=felt.]

Surg.: A substitute for a poultice made of an absorbent stratum of sponge and fiber on an india-rubber backing.

spōn'-gī-ōūs, spōn'-gī-ōse, a. [Eng. spong(e); -ious, -iose.] Sponge-like, like a sponge; spongy.

spōng'-īte, s. [Gr. spongitēs=of, in, or like a sponge.]

Palæont.: A fossil sponge.

spōn'-gōld, a. [English spong(e); -suff. -oid.] Resembling a sponge; sponge-like, spongy.

spōng'-y, spūng'-y, a. [Eng. spong(e); -y.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Resembling a sponge; sponge-like; soft and full of cavities; of an open, loose and easily compressible texture; spongy.

"A light spongy wood, and easily wrought."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. i., ch. xviii.

2. Having the quality of imbibing like a sponge; hence, drenched, soaked. (Lit. & Fig.)

"There is no lady of more softer bowels,
More spongy to suck in the sense of fear."
Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, ii. 2.

*3. Wet, rainy.

"The spongy south."—Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iv. 2.

II. Bot.: Having the texture of a sponge; very cellular; with the cellules filled with air, as the coats of many seeds.

spongy-bones, s. pl.

Anat.: Various bones of spongy texture. The superior spongy bone is the superior turbinated process of the nose, the middle spongy bone its middle meatus, and the inferior one the inferior turbinated or maxillo-turbinate bone. There are also ethmoidal and sphenoidal spongy bones.

spongy-platinum, s. [PLATINUM-SPONGE.]

spongy-quartz, s.

Min.: A variety of quartz with a cellular, sponge-like structure which will float on water. Similar to floatstone (q. v.).

Bot.: A stem internally of spongy texture; a stem composed internally of elastic cellular tissue.

spōn'-ī-ā, s. [Named after Jacob Spon (1647-1685), a French physician.]

Bot.: A genus of Cisteæ. The bark of Sponia orientalis, formerly called Celtis orientalis, a small Indian tree, yields a gum. The Coorg planters call it Charcoal-tree, the burnt wood yielding good charcoal for gunpowder. S. politoria, also Indian, is used to tie the rafters of native houses.

sponk, s. [SPUNK.]

spōn'-sal, a. [Lat. sponsalis.] Pertaining or relating to marriage.

spōn'-sī-ble, adj. [A contract. of responsible (q. v.).]

1. Capable of discharging an obligation; responsible. (Scotch.)

2. Respectable, creditable; becoming one's station. (Scotch.)

spōn'-sīng, spōn'-cīng, s. [SPONSON.]

spōn'-sion, s. [Lat. sponsio=a solemn promise or engagement, from sponsus, pa. par. of spondeo=to promise solemnly.] [SPOUSE.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: The act of becoming surety for another.

"A mockery, rather than a solemn sponsion, in too many."—Burnet: Hist. Own Time. (Concl.)

2. Internat. Law: An act or engagement made on behalf of a state by an agent not specially authorized. Such conventions must be confirmed by express or tacit satisfaction.

*spōn'-sion-al, adj. [Eng. sponsion; -al.] Responsible; implying a pledge.

"It is evident that he is righteous, even in that representative and sponsional person he put on."—Leighton: Sermons, ser. 5.

spōn'-sōn, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Shipbuild.: The angular space before and abaft the paddle-box against the ship's side.

"The people in the steamer, wanting to see what was happenin', all ran to one side, of course, and listed her down till she was sponson under."—London Daily Telegraph.

sponson-beam, s.

Shipbuilding: One of the two projecting beams uniting the paddle-box beam with the ship's side.

sponson-rim, s.

Shipbuilding: The wale connecting the paddle-beam with the ship's side.

spōn'-sōr, s. [Lat., from sponsus, pa. par. of spondeo=to promise.]

1. A surety; one who binds himself to answer for another, and to be responsible for his default.

2. Specif.: One who is surety for an infant at baptism; a godfather or godmother.

"William was one of the sponsors."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

spōn'-sōr'-ī-āl, a. [Eng. sponsor; -ial.] Of or pertaining to a sponsor.

spōn'-sōr-ship, s. [Eng. sponsor; -ship.] The state of being a sponsor; the office or position of a sponsor.

"The loan is to be raised in England, under the auspices of the first financial house in Europe, a sponsorship which would insure its success."—London Daily Telegraph.

spōn-tā-nē'-ī-tŷ, s. [Fr. spontanéité.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The quality or state of being spontaneous, or of acting from natural feeling, inclination, or impulse, without constraint or external force.

"Really a large and charming sketch, it has all the artist's spirit, spontaneity, and wealth of tones."—Athenæum, Dec. 20, 1884.

II. Technically:

1. Biol.: The tendency to variation, unrestrained by environment. [VARIATION.]

2. Mental Philos.: The doctrine that muscular activity may, and does, arise from internal causes, apart from, and independent of, the stimulus of sensations. It supposes that the nerve-centers, after repose and nourishment, acquire a fullness of vital energy which discharges itself in the play of movement, without any other occasion or motive. The addition of a feeling or end enhances and directs the activity, but does not wholly create it. Freshness in horses, the gambols of puppies and kittens, and the boisterous play of children, are examples of spontaneity. (Bain: Senses and Intellect.)

spōn-tā-nē'-ōūs, a. [Latin spontaneus, from spondeo=of one's free will.]

1. Proceeding from natural disposition, inclination, or impulse, without constraint or external force; impulsive.

2. Acting by its own impulse, energy, or natural law, without external force.

"And rusted bolt and bar Spontaneous took their place once more."

Scott: Bridal of Triermain, iii. 17.

3. Produced or growing without being planted, or without human labor.

"Thorns spring spontaneous at her feet."

Couper: Guion; Joy of the Cross spontaneous-combustion, s. [COMBUSTION.]

spontaneous-fission, s. [FISSION, 2.]

spontaneous-generation, s. [GENERATION.]

spontaneous-rotation, s. [ROTATION.]

spōn-tā-nē'-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. spontaneously; -ly.]

1. In a spontaneous manner; of one's own impulse, inclination, or disposition; impulsively, without external influence.

"He never gave spontaneously; but it was painful to him to refuse."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

2. By inherent or natural force or energy; without external influence, impulse, or force.

"The soil of the island is truly luxuriant, producing fruits of many kinds spontaneously."—Anson: Voyages, bk. i, ch. v.

spōn-tā-nē'-ōūs-nēss, subst. [Eng. spontaneous; -ness.] The quality or state of being spontaneous; spontaneity.

"The sagacities and instincts of brutes, the spontaneity of many of their animal motions."—Hale: Origin of Mankind, p. 49.

spōn-toōn', subst. [Fr. esponçon, sponçon; Ital. sponzone, spuntone, from punto; Lat. punctum=a point.]

Old Arms: A military weapon; a kind of half-pike or halberd, borne by infantry officers in the British service up to 1787. It was used for signaling orders to the regiment.

"Says Johnson, in a tone of admiration, How the little fellow brandished his sponto!"—Murphy: Life of Johnson.

spoōk, s. [Dut. spook; Ger. spuk.] A ghost, a hobgoblin.

spoōl, *spole, s. [O. Dut. spoele; Dut. spoel; Low Ger. spole; Sw. spole; Dan. spole; O. H. Ger. spuolo, spuolā; Ger. spule.] A hollow cylinder upon which thread may be wound. It assumes various forms: The ordinary spool or reel for sewing-cotton; the spool for winding-machines, otherwise called a bobbin; the spool to hold the thread in a shuttle, and revolving on a spindle in the latter.

1. A spool-stand (q. v.).

2. A creel on which spools or bobbins are placed on skewers for warping.

3. A skewer on a sewing-machine to hold a spool of cotton or thread.

spool-stand, s. A frame for holding various-sized spools for work-table purposes or for exhibition in stores.

spoōl, v. t. [SPOOL, s.] To wind on a spool.

spoōl'-ēr, s. [Eng. spool; -er.] One who uses a spool.

spoōl'-īng, s. [SPOOL, v.] The winding of yarn or thread upon bobbins.

spoōm, v. i. [Prob. from spume=foam.]

Naut.: To move swiftly, as a vessel through the water. (Also written Spoon.)

"When virtue spoons before a prosperous gale, My heaving wishes help to fill the sail."

Dryden: Hind and Panther, iii. 96.

spoōn, *spon, *spone, *spooone, s. [A. S. spón=a chip, a splinter of wood; cogn. with Dnt. spaan=a chip, a splint; Icel. spánn, spónn=a chip, a spoon; Dan. spaan; Sw. spán; O. H. Ger. spán; Ger. span.]

I. Literally:

1. A domestic utensil, having a shallow bowl at the end of a handle, and used for taking up and conveying to the mouth liquids or liquid food. Spoons are made of various sizes and materials, according to the particular purpose for which they are intended. Spoons for the administration of medicine are made with a cover or shield, which converts the pointed end into a funnel.

"He must have a long spoon that must eat with the devil."—Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, iv. 3.

2. A spoon-bait (q. v.).

"In the sea they will often take a spoon."—Field, Sept. 4, 1886.

3. A kind of club used in the game of golf.

"He played a capital shot with his spoon, clearing a wide ditch."—Field, Sept. 4, 1886.

4. Cotton: A weighted and gravitating arm in the stop-motion of a drawing-machine, which is kept in position by the tension of the sliver, and falls when the sliver breaks or the can is emptied, and thereby arrests the motion of the machine.

II. Figuratively: A foolish fellow, a simpleton, a spooney. (Slang.)

"But you'll find very soon, if you aim at the moon
In a carriage like that, you're a bit of a spoon."

Barham: Ing. Legends; The Witches' Frolic.

¶ (1) Book of Sports:

Eng. Hist.: A proclamation issued by James I., on May 24, 1618, entitled, "The King's Majesty's Declaration to his subjects concerning lawful sports to be used." It is often represented as enjoining sports on the Lord's day. It only enacted that people "should not after the end of Divine service be disturbed, letted, or discouraged from any lawful recreations." Its first publication led to a Sabbatarian controversy. The Declaration was embodied in a similar document issued by Charles I. in 1633, and the severity with which the public reading of it by the clergy was enforced aroused the Puritans to a degree of indignation which contributed not a little to the overthrow of the Monarchy and the Establishment. In 1644, the Parliament ordered all copies of it to be called in and publicly burned.

spot-lens, s.

Microscopy: A hemispherical lens with a large opaque spot in the center of its plane face, adjustable with this plane side upward under the stage of the microscope, so that the object is in the focus of the rays which it converges from the mirror. The effect of this arrangement is that no direct light from the mirror can enter the objective, the spot causing a central shadow, but the light received by the object from the marginal rays, and reflected again by its particles, does enter. Hence the object appears as if brightly self-illuminated upon a dark background.

spot-stroke, s.

Billiards: A stroke which consists in holing the red ball time after time in one of the top pockets.

S. sprēdan=to extend, to spread out; cogn. with Dut. spreiden=to spread, to scatter; Low Ger. spreiden, spreēn, sprein; Ger. spreiten; Danish sprede; Sw. sprida; Sw. dial. sprita.]

A. Transitive:

1. To extend in length and breadth, or in breadth only; to stretch or expand out to a broader surface. (2 Samuel xxi. 10.)

2. To open, to unfurl; to stretch or extend out. (Shakesp.: Much Ado, ii. 3.)

*3. To scatter, to disperse; to cause to disperse.

"Was nener in alle his lyne ther fadere ore so glad,
Als whan he sauh his sons tuo, the paiens force to sprad."
Robert de Brunne, p. 18.

4. To scatter over a large surface; to strew.

B. Intransitive:

1. To be extended in length and breadth in all directions; to be expanded to a broader surface or extent; to be extended or stretched out.

"Her barbarous sons . . . spread Beneath Gibraltar to the Lybian sands."
Milton: P. L., i. 354.

2. To be propagated, published, circulated, or made known more extensively; as, a report spreads.

3. To be propagated from one to another.

"Lest his infection spread further."
Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iii. 1.

sprēad, s. [SPREAD, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of spreading; the state of being spread; extent, compass, diffusion, dissemination; as, the spread of knowledge.

"Away he springs."—Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 258.

5. To start up or rise suddenly, as from a covert, &c.

"A covey of partridges springing in our front, put our infantry in disorder."—Addison.

6. To fly back, to start, as a bow when bent springs back by its elasticity.

7. To shoot; to issue suddenly and with violence.
"Then shook the sacred shrine, and sudden light Sprung thro' the vaulted roof, and made the temple bright."—Dryden: Palamon and Arcite, iii. 266.

*8. To thrive, to grow.

"What makes all this but Jupiter the king,

At what makes all this but Jupiter the king?"

Dryden: Palamon and Arcite, iii. 1,082.

9. To warp; to become warped or bent from a straight or plane surface, as timber in seasoning.

B. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

"The too much praise

Could not but sprung up blushes in my cheeks."

Massinger: Parl. of Love, v. 1.

2. To cause to explode or burst; to discharge.

"Our miners discovered several of the enemies' mines, who have sprung divers others which did little execution."—Tatler.

3. To cause to open; as, to sprung a leak.

4. To crack; to bend or strain, so as to crack or split.

"The Genesta has broken her bowsprit off short . . .
if she has not also sprung her topmast."—London Daily Telegraph.

5. To cause to close suddenly, or come together violently, as the parts of an instrument which are acted upon by a spring; as, to sprung a trap.

6. To bend by force, as something stiff or strong; to insert, as a beam in a place too short for it, by bending it so as to bring the ends nearer together, and allowing it to straighten when in place. (Usually with in; as, to sprung in a slat or bar.) (Goodrich.)

*7. To leap over; to jump; to pass by leaping.

"To sprung the fence, to rein the prancing steed."

Thomson.

II. Arch.: To commence from an abutment or pier; as, to sprung an arch.

¶ (1) To sprung a butt:

Naut.: To loosen the end of a plank in a ship's bottom.

spring, sprynge, sprynge, s. [SPRING, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A leap, a bound; a sudden effort or struggle.

"A very hunter did I rush Upon the prey: with leaps and springs."

Wordsworth: To a Butterfly.

2. A flying back; the resistance of a body recovering its former state by its elastic power; as, the spring of a bow.

3. Elastic power or force; elasticity.

"In adult persons, when the fibers cannot any more yield, they must break, or lose their spring."—Arbuthnot.

4. An elastic substance of any kind, having the power of recovering, by its elasticity, its natural state, after being bent or otherwise forced, interposed between two objects, in order to impart or check motion or permit them to yield relatively to each other. Springs are made of various materials, as india-rubber, strips of wire or steel coiled spirally, steel rods or plates, &c., and are used for many purposes; as, for diminishing concussion in carriages, for motive power, acting through the tendency of a metallic coil to unwind itself, as in clocks and watches; to measure weight and other forces as in the spring-balance, &c. Springs of coiled wire are much used for balances, for chair and sofa cushions and backs, mattresses, and in various other domestic applications where no great amount of strength is required.

"The spring must be made of good steel, well tempered; and the wider the two ends of the spring stand asunder, the milder it throws the chape of the vise open."

—Moxon: Mechanical Exercises.

5. Any active power; that by which action or motion is produced or propagated.

"Nature is the same, and man is the same, has the same affections and passions, and the same springs that give them motion."—Rymer.

6. In the same sense as II. 2.

¶ Often used adjectively, as spring water.

7. Any source of supply; source, origin; that from which anything springs or is derived; a source of supply.

"Philosophy and science, and the springs
Of wonder, and the wisdom of the world."

Byron: Manfred, i. 1.

8. One of the four seasons of the year; that season in which plants begin to spring and vegetate; the vernal season. In the northern hemisphere the spring season begins about March 21, when the sun enters the sign of Aries, and ends about June 22, at the time of the summer solstice. Popularly, however, spring is considered to begin in February or March, and end in April or May.

"Spring is here with leaf and grass."

Tennyson: The Window, 128.

9. Hence, the beginning or freshest part of any state or time; the early part.

"Our love was new, and then but in the spring."

Shakesp.: Sonnet 102.

10. A young shoot, a bud.

"Where the new spring first shooteth forth."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xvii., ch. xxi.

11. A plant, a young tree; also a grove of trees; a small shrubbery.

"In yonder spring of roses."—Milton: P. L., ix. 218.

12. Specifically applied to a white thorn. (Prov.)

"They are commonly erected upon the top of new banks, until the spring has grown strong enough to protect it."—Field, Jan. 23, 1886.

*13. A youth, a sprigal.

"The one his bow and shafts, the other spring
A burning tead about his head did move."

Spenser: Muipopotmos.

*14. A race, a family.

15. A flock (of teal).

"Presently surprising a spring of teal with good effects on our bag."—London Daily Telegraph.

*16. That which causes one to spring; specifically, a lively, quick, and cheerful tune.

"He play'd a spring and danc'd it round Below the gallows-tree."

Burns: McPherson's Farewell.

II. Technically:

1. Nautical:

* (1) A leak; the starting of a plank; an opening in a seam.

"Where her springs are, her leaks and how to stop 'em."

Ben Jonson: Catiline, iii. 1.

(2) A crack in a mast or yard, running obliquely or transversely.

(3) A rope or hawser passed from the stern of a ship and made fast to the cable on the anchor from the bow, by which she is riding. The object is to bring the broadside to bear in any direction.

(4) A check on a cable while unshackling it.

(5) A rope extending diagonally from the stern of one ship to the head of another, to make one ship sheer off to a greater distance.

2. Phys. Geog. & Geol.: An overflow of water or other liquid. When rain falls on a porous soil it is rapidly absorbed, the surface of the soil being soon again dry. Meanwhile, the water has percolated downward till it has, at a greater or less depth, been intercepted by an impervious stratum, where it gradually forms a reservoir. It then presses with great force laterally, and a system of subterranean drainage is established. If the impervious stratum be some distance up a hillside, the water finds its way out, not, however, all along the stratum, for the existence of rents, fissures, and inequalities confines it to a few spots. If the reservoir be on an elevation and a boring be made on a lower level to any of the branches leading from it, the water will rise in the bore to the surface and shoot up into the air to a height proportional to the pressure from the reservoir, as an Artesian well (q. v.), which is akin to a spring. Springs are of two kinds, land and perennial springs, the former existing where there is a porous soil with an impervious subsoil, the latter deriving their waters from deeper sources. Perennial springs include thermal springs and geysers. [INTERMITTENT-SPRING.] Sometimes springs contain much earthy material; thus there are calcareous, sulphureous and gypseous, siliceous, ferruginous, saline, carbonated and petroleum springs. They are then called mineral springs.

¶ (1) Spring of pork: The lower part of the fore-quarter, which is divided from the neck and has the leg and foot without the shoulder. (Beaum. & Flét.: Prophetess.)

* (2) Spring of the day: The dawn, dawning.

"About the spring of the day, Samuel called Saul to the top of the house."—1 Samuel, ix. 26.

spring-back, s.

Bookbinding: A mode of binding in which a spring in the back throws up the folded edge so as to make the leaves lie flat.

spring-balance, subst. A balance in which the weight of an object is determined from the tension or compression of a spring provided with an index and scale. In the ordinary form (A) the spring is spiral and inclosed in a cylindrical box, at whose upper end is a suspending ring. The hook from which the object to be weighed is suspended is connected by a rod to a piston above the spring, so that the weight has the effect of condensing the spring, a finger on the rod projecting through a long slot in the case and indicating the weight upon a graduated and numbered scale. Another (B) is in the form of the letter C, the upper end being suspended by a ring, and the lower end affording attachment for the hook whereby the object is suspended. As the bow opens a finger traverses a graduated arc and registers the weight.

Spring-balance valve:

Steam: A spiral spring weighing-balance, with an index and pointer attached to the end of the lever, by which the pressure upon the safety-valve is adjusted.

Spring-balances.

squāl'-ō-dōn, s. [Mod. Latin squal(us); suff. -odon.] [SQUALODONTIDÆ.]

squāl'-ō-dōn'-tī-dæ, s. [Mod. Lat. squalodon, genit. squalodont(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.] Palæont.: A family of Odontoceti, consisting of a single genus, Squalodon, founded for the reception of numerous extinct forms—chiefly teeth and fragments of crania—widely distributed throughout the Marine Miocene and early Pliocene of Europe, North America, and South Australia. The teeth are in groups, as in Zeuglodon (q. v.), the posterior molars with two roots; the cranium is essentially odontocete.

squāl'-ōld, a. [Lat. squalus=a shark; Eng. suff. -oid.] Like a shark; resembling a shark.

squāl'-ōr, s. [Lat.] [SQUALID.] The quality or state of being squalid; dirt, filth, foulness.

squāl'-ō-rā'-ja (j as y), s. [Mod. Lat. squalus, and raja.]

Palæont.: A genus of Selachioidei, from the Lias of Lyme Regis. (For detailed description, see Proc. Zool. Soc., 1886, pp. 527-38.)

squāl'-ūs, s. [Lat.]

Ichthy.: A Linnæan genus of Amphibia, with five lateral spiracles. It was approximately equivalent to the modern Selachioidei (q. v.), and, in a more or less modified form, found a place in several classifications, but has now lapsed.

squā'-mā (pl. squā'-mæ), s. [Lat.=a scale.]

1. Bot.: A scale. [SCALE (1), s., II. 1 (1).]

2. Compar. Anat.: A horny scale. [SCALE (1), s., f. 2, 3.]

3. Pathol. (pl.): An order of skin-diseases in which morbid secretion of the epidermis produces scales; scurf, readily detached, but reproduced again and again by desquamation; the scales are degenerated, thickened, dry epidermis covering minute papular elevations of the skin. Local heat and itching are present, but there is no constitutional disturbance. The order comprehends psoriasis, including lepra, pityriasis, and ichthyosis (q. v.). None is contagious.

4. Zool.: [ELYTRON, 2.]

squā'-mā'-ceōūs (ce as sh), a. [SQUAMA.] The same as SQUAMOSE (q. v.).

†squā'-mā'-tā, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. squamatus=scaly.]

Zool.: A section of Reptilia, in which the skin is covered with scales. It contains the Lizards and Snakes.

squā'-māte, squā'-māt-ēd, a. [SQUAMA.] Covered with small scale-like bodies; scaly.

squā'-mā'-tion, s. [Eng., &c., squam(a); -ation.] The formation of squamæ, or scale-like processes, e. g. the rosettes of scale-shaped leaves in the rose-willow.

squāme, s. [Lat. squama.] A scale.

"As orpiment, brent bones, yren squames."

Chaucer: C. T., 16, 226.

¶ Still occasionally used in Natural Science, as in Huxley: Crayfish, p. 172.

squā'-mēl'-lā, subst. [Dimin. from Lat. squama (q. v.).]

1. Bot.: A scale-like, membranous bract, as on the receptacle in Composites. (In this sense there is a plural squa-mēl'-læ.)

2. Zool.: A genus of Rotifera, family Euehlaniotæ. It has four eyes, and the trochal discs or rotatory organs are divided.

squā'-mēl'-lāte, squām'-ū-lōse, a. [Mod. Lat. squamellatus, squamulosus, from squamella (q. v.).] Having, or covered with squamellæ.

squām'-ī-form, a. [Lat. squama=a scale, and forma=form.] Having the form or shape of scales.

squā'-mīg'-ēr-ōūs, a. [Lat. squama=a scale, and gero=to bear.] Scaly; bearing or having scales.

squā'-mī-pēn, s. [SQUAMIPENNES.] One of the Squamipennes.

squā'-mī-pēn'-nēs, s. pl. [SQUAMIPINNES.]

[Lat. squā-mī-pēn'-nēs, squā-mī-pēn'-nēs, s. pl.]

Ichthy.: Coral-fishes; a family equivalent to the Chatodontidæ (q. v.). (See extract.)

"The typical forms of this family are readily recognized by the form of their body, and by a peculiarity from which they derive their name, Squamipinnes; the soft, and frequently also the spinous, part of their dorsal and anal fins are so thickly covered with scales that the boundary between fins and body is entirely obliterated."—Günther: Study of Fishes, p. 397.

squā-mō-, prefix. [Latin squama.] Squamose (q. v.).

Anat.: A term applied to the squamous portion of the temporal bone, and to the squamosals or squamous bones collectively.

squām'-ōld, a. [Lat. squam(a)=a scale; Eng. suff. -oid.] Resembling a scale or scales; covered with scales or scale-like integuments; scaly.

squā-mō'-sāl, a. & s. [Eng. squamos(e); -al.]

A. As adj.: Squamous (q. v.).

B. As substantive:

Anat.: The squamous part of the temporal bone; applied collectively in the plural to this bone, the zygoma, and the articular surface of the lower jaw.

squām'-ōse, a. [SQUAMOUS.]

Bot. (of a surface): Covered with the rudiments of leaves; covered with minute scales fixed by one end, as the young shoots of the pine-tribe.

squām'-ōūs, a. [Lat. squamosus, from squama=a scale.] Covered with scales; consisting of scales, resembling scales, scaly.

"In the gems of oak, which may be called squamous oak-cones."—Derham: Physico-Theology, bk. viii., ch. vi. (Note.)

squamous-bones, s. pl. [SQUAMOSAL, B.]

squamous-bulb, s.

Bot.: A scaly bulb. [BULB, II. 1.]

squamous-suture, subst. [TEMPORO-PARIETAL SUTURE.]

squā'-mū-lā (pl. squā'-mū-læ), subst. [Latin, dimin. from squama (q. v.).]

Bot.: A paleola, a lodicule (q. v.). Called also a Squamule.

squām'-ūle, s. [SQUAMULA.]

squām'-ū-lōse, a. [SQUAMELLATE.]

squān'-dēr, v. t. & i. [A nasalized form of Lowland Scotch squatter=to splash water about, to scatter, to dissipate, to squander; Prov. English swattler, swattle, freq. from Dan. svatte=to splash, to squirt, to squander; Sw. svätta=to squander, freq. of svätta=to squirt. (Wedgwood.)]

A. Transitive:

*1. To scatter, to dissipate, to disperse.

"And the recollections of the great Armada squandered upon the sea."—London Daily Telegraph.

2. To spend lavishly, wastefully, or profusely; to spend prodigally, to waste, to dissipate, to lavish.

"The cruel wretch . . . has squander'd vile,
Upon his scoundrel train, what might have cheer'd
A drooping family."—Thomson: Summer, 1, 638.

B. Intrans.: To waste one's substance; to spend prodigally or profusely.

"A vast excess of wealth for squandering heirs."

King: Art of Cookery, let. iv.

squān'-dēr, subst. [SQUANDER, v.] The act or habit of squandering; waste, prodigality.

squān'-dēr-ēr, s. [Eng. squander, v.; -er.] One who squanders; one who spends his substance prodigally or lavishly; a spendthrift, a prodigal, a lavish.

"Plenty in their own keeping teaches them from the beginning to be squanderers and wasters."—Locke: Education, § 130.

squān'-dēr-īng, pr. par. or a. [SQUANDER, v.]

squān'-dēr-īng-lý, adverb. [Eng. squandering; -ly.] In a squandering, wasteful, or prodigal manner; prodigally, wastefully, lavishly.

squāre, a., adv. & s. [O. Fr. esquarré=squared, square; esquarre=a square, squareness; Italian squadra, from Lat. ex=out, fully, and quadro=to square, to make four-cornered, from quadrus (for quaterus)=four-cornered, from quatuor=four; Fr. équarre; Sp. escuadra.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Having four equal sides and four right angles; as, a square room, a square table, &c.

(2) Forming a right angle.

"This instrument is for striking lines square to other lines or straight sides, and try the squareness of their work."—Moxon.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Having a shape broad for the height, with rectilinear and angular rather than curved outlines; stout, well set; as, a man of a square frame.

* (2) Exactly suitable or correspondent; true, just.

"She's a most triumphant lady, if report be square to her."—Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 2.

(3) Rendering equal justice; just, fair, honest; as, square dealing.

* (4) Fair, right, just.

"All have not offended;

For those that were, it is not square to take,

On those that are, revenges."

Shakesp.: Timon of Athens, v. 5.

(5) Even; leaving no balance; exactly balanced.

"James again brought matters square on the fifth."—Field, Oct. 3, 1885.

(6) Leaving nothing; hearty, vigorous.

(7) Complete, hearty, full, satisfying.

"By heaven! square eaters!

More meat, I say."

Beaum. & Flet.: Bonduca, ii. 2.

II. Naut.: At right angles with the mast or the keel, and parallel to the horizon.

B. As adverb:

1. Lit.: At right angles; as, to hit a ball square to the wickets in cricket.

2. Fig.: Squarely, fairly, honestly; as, to act square. (Colloq.)

C. Assubstantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 5.

"Pores round his cell for undiscovered stars,

And decks the wall with triangles and squares."

Fawkes: A Voyage to the Planets.

(2) A figure, body, or substance nearly approaching such a figure; a square piece or surface.

(3) An area of four sides with houses on each side; sometimes a square block of houses, and sometimes applied to an area formed by the meeting or intersection of two or more streets.

"The statue of Alexander VII. stands in the large square of the town."—Addison: On Italy.

(4) A square body of troops; a squadron. [II. 7.]

"He alone

Dealt on lieutenantry, and no practice had

In the brave squares of war."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 11.

(5) A pane of glass.

* (6) Squareness; measure along each side of a square figure.

"Then did a sharped spyre of diamond bright,

Ten feete each way in square, appeare to mee."

Spenser: Visions of Bellay.

(7) An implement used by artificers for laying off lines to which work is to be sawed or cut. It consists essentially of two pieces at right angles to each other, one of which is sometimes pivoted, so that other angles than a right angle may be scribed or measured. A T square is one in which one ruler meets the other in the middle, so as to form the figure of a letter T. (Written also Squier, Squire, Swere, Swire.)

"Do you not know my lady's foot by th' squier,

And laugh upon the apple of her eye?"

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

*2. Figuratively:

(1) A measure, standard, pattern, or model.

"Those that affect antiquity will follow the square thereof."—Milton.

(2) Rule, regularity; exact proportion; justness of workmanship and conduct.

"I have not kept my square, but that to come shall all be done by th' rule."—Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 3.

(3) Level, equality.

"We live not on the square with such as these,

Such are our betters who can better please."

Dryden. (Todd.)

(4) A quarrel.

(5) The front part of the female dress near the bosom, generally worked or embroidered.

"Between her breasts the cruel weapon rises

Her curious square, embossed with swelling gold."

Fairfax.

II. Technically:

1. Arith. & Alg.: The result obtained by taking a quantity twice as a factor. Thus 16 (4×4) is the square of 4.

2. Astrol.: Quartile; the position of planets 90 degrees distant from each other.

"Their planetary motions and aspects,

In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite,

Of noxious efficacy."—Milton: P. L., x. 659.

3. Bookbind.: The projection of a board beyond the book-edge.

4. Carp.: 100 feet, that is, 10×10 ; a unit of measurement used in boarding and roofing.

5. Geom.: An equilateral and quadrilateral, having all its angles right angles. The diagonals of a square are equal, and mutually bisect each other at right angles. The ratio of either side of a square to its diagonal is that of 1 to $\sqrt{2}$. The square is employed as a unit of measure in determining the area of surfaces, whence the term square measure, in that connection. The area of any square is equal to the product of two adjacent sides.

6. Hor.: That portion of the arbor on which the winding-key is placed, or a similar part on the arbor of the hands of a watch, whereby they are set.

7. Military: A formation adopted by infantry, formerly, to resist a charge of cavalry. It was two or four men deep, the front ranks kneeling with fixed bayonets, and the rear rankstanding. Occasionally squares have been formed to inclose baggage, wounded, &c., when in presence of overwhelming numbers, as in savage warfare.

8. Naut.: That part of the shank of an anchor to which the stock and shackle are attached.

9. Print.: A certain number of lines in a column, of nearly equal height and width. (Eng.)

¶ 1. All square: All right, all arranged.

*2. At square: In or into opposition or enmity. [SQUARE, s., I. 2. (4).]

"Falling at square with hir husband."—Holinshed. Hist. Eng., bk. iv., ch. viii.

3. Geometrical square: [GEOMETRICAL.]

4. Magic square: [MAGIC.]

5. Method of least squares: The method of finding the probable error in assuming the mean of a number of discordant observations of a phenomenon; the method of determining the values of certain elements by means of several equations which only approximately express the relations existing between the elements. These approximate equations of condition are usually derived from a series of observations, or of experiments, which are necessarily liable to certain errors. It is shown in the theory of probabilities, that the probable error will be least when the sum of the squares of the errors is a minimum.

6. On (or upon) the square:

(1) Lit.: At right angles; as, to cut cloth on the square.

(2) Fig.: Fairly, honestly; as, to act on the square. (Colloq.)

*7. Out of square: Out of the proper order, rule, or proportion.

"The whole ordinaunce of that government was at first evil plotted, and through other oversights came more out of square, to that disorder which it is now come unto."—Spenser: State of Ireland.

8. Three square, five square, &c.: Having three, five, &c., equal sides; having three, five, &c., angles. (An improper use of square.)

"One end of which being thicker, and almost three square, is inserted into the first bone of the sternon."—Wiseman: Surgery.

*9. To break no squares: To make no difference; to give no offense.

"I will break no squares whether it be so or not."—L'Estrange: Fables.

*10. To break squares: To depart from the accustomed order.

*11. To see how squares go: To see how matters are going; to see how the game proceeds. (An expression borrowed from chess, the chess-board being divided into squares.)

"One frog looked about him to see how squares went with their new king."—L'Estrange: Fables.

square-built, adj. Of a square build or frame; having a shape broad for the height, and bounded by rectilinear rather than curved lines; as, a square-built man.

square-coupling, s.

Mill-work.: A kind of permanent coupling, of which the coupling-box is made in halves and square, corresponding to the form of the two connected ends of the shafts. The halves of the box are bolted together on the opposite sides.

square-file, s. An entering-file (q. v.).

Join.: Applied to a work when the framing has all the angles of its styles, rails, and mountings square, without being molded.

square-joint, s.

Join.: A mode of joining wooden stuff, in which the edges are brought squarely together, without rabbeting, tongue, or feather.

square-leg, s.

Cricket: A fielder who stands square with the wicket and behind the batsman.

square-leg, v. t.

Cricket: To hit to square-leg.

"Mr. Read continued a fine display of well-judged hitting by square-legging both bowlers for a couple each time."—London Daily Telegraph.

square-measures, s. pl. The squares of lineal measures; as, a square inch, a square yard, &c.

Arith.: A number which may be resolved into two equal factors; the product of a number multiplied into itself. Thus, 4, 9, 16, 25, are square numbers, being the squares of 2, 3, 4, 5 respectively.

Bot.: Meum buniis.

square-rig, s.

Naut.: That rig in which the lower sails are suspended from horizontal yards, as distinguished from fore-and-aft rig.

square-rigged, a. [SHIP-RIGGED.]

square-roof, s.

Arith. & Alg.: A quantity which, being taken twice as a factor, will produce the given quantity. Thus, the square root of 25 is 5, because $5 \times 5 = 25$; so also $\frac{2}{3}$ is the square root of $\frac{4}{9}$, since $\frac{2}{3} \times \frac{2}{3} = \frac{4}{9}$; x^2 is the square root of x^4 , since $x^2 \times x^2 = x^4$; $a+x$ is the square root of $a^2+2ax+x^2$, and so on. When the square root of a number can be expressed in exact parts of 1, that number is a perfect square, and the indicated square root is said to be commensurable. All other indicated square roots are incommensurable.

square-sail, s.

Nautical:

1. A four-sided sail, whose middle position is athwartship. It is supported by a yard, slung at its mid-length by a truss or parral. It is distinguished from sails which are extended by stays, booms, gaffs, lateens, sprits, &c.

2. A sail set on the foremasts of schooners, and on the masts of sloops and cutters, when sailing before the wind in light weather.

Entom.: A European geometer-moth, Tephrosia consonaria.

Square-spot dart:

Entom.: A European night-moth, Agrotis obelisca.

Square-spot rustic:

Entom.: A European night-moth, Noctua xanthographa.

square-spotted clay, s.

Entom.: A European night-moth, Noctua rhomboidea.

square-stern, s.

Naut.: A transom stern.

1. Lit.: Having the toes or end square.

"It [common-place wit] is as obsolete as fardingales, ruffs, and square-toed shoes."—Knox: Winter Evenings, even. 9.

2. Fig.: Formal, precise, prim, finical, punctilious.

square-toes, s. A formal, precise, or finical, old-fashioned person. A term derived from the wearing by gentlemen of the old school the square-toed boots of their younger days.

square-tucks, s. pl.

Shipbuild.: The flat surfaces left at the stern of a vessel when the planks of the bottom are not worked round to the wing-transom, but end in the fashioned piece.

squäre, v. t. & i. [SQUARE, a.]

A. Transitive:

"Squared in full legion."—Milton: P. L., viii. 232.

2. Figuratively:

* (1) To reduce or bring to any given measure or standard; to compare with a given standard.

"To square the general sex

By Cressid's rule."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, v. 2.

* (2) To adjust, to accommodate, to regulate, to shape.

"O, that ever I

Had squared me to thy counsel."

Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, v. 1.

* (3) To hold a quartile position respecting; to be at right angles to.

"The icy Goat and Crab that square the Scales."

Crech: Lucretius.

(4) To make even, so as to leave no difference or balance; to equalize.

"Mr. Laidlay won with six, and squared matters."—Field, Sept. 25, 1886.

* (5) To balance, to counterbalance.

"I hope, I say, both being put together, may square out the most eminent of the ancient gentry, in some tolerable proportion."—Fuller: Worthies, vol. i., ch. xv.

(6) To arrange matters with; to bring to one's side by a bribe or the like; to gain over, as to silence. (Slang.)

"They have squandered enormous sums of money in squaring a huge army of committee men, collectors, and other haugers-on."—London Globe.

II. Technically:

1. Math.: To multiply by itself; as, to square a number or quantity.

2. Naut.: To place at right angles with the mast or keel; as, to square the yards.

B. Intransitive:

1. To suit, to accord, to agree, to fit. (Followed by with.) (Couper: Charity, 559.)

"He found a squarish hole cut."—De Foe: Tour thro' Great Britain, i. 319.

squar'-röse, squar'-rouš, a. [Latin squarrosus=rough, scurfy, scabby.]

Bot.: Spreading rigidly out from a common axis, at right angles or nearly so, as the leaves of some mosses, the involucres of some composites, &c.

"The involucral scales are squarrose."—Gardeners' Chronicle, 1881, p. 600.

Botany: Slashed with minor divisions at right angles with the others. Called also Squarrosolaciniata.

squar-rō-sō-, pref. [SQUARROSE.] (See etym. and compounds.)

Bot.: Having teeth which do not lie in the plane of the leaf, but form an angle with it.

squarroso-laciniata, a. [SQUARROSE-SLASHED.]

Bot.: Deeply pinnatifid with squarrose divisions, as the leaf of Achillea millefolium.

Bot.: Pinnatifid, with the segments so straggling as to appear on different planes.

squar'-rouš, a. [SQUARROSE.]

squar'-ru-löse, adj. [Mod. Lat. squarrosus, dimin. from Lat. squarrosus.] [SQUARROSE.]

Bot.: Somewhat squarrose.

Zoöl.: A popular name for any of the Sciuridae (q. v.); widely distributed in America, Europe, the Caucasus, Southern Siberia, and probably in Persia. It is an elegant little animal with bright black eyes; from eight to ten inches in length, with a bushy tail nearly as long; color gray or reddish-brown, white beneath, but the hue varies with the seasons, in Lapland and Siberia the upper surface becomes gray, and in Central Europe is sprinkled with gray, in the winter. Squirrels haunt woods and forests, nesting in trees, and displaying marvellous agility among the branches. They feed on nuts, acorns, beech-mast, which they store up, birds' eggs, and the young bark, shoots, and buds of trees, doing no small amount of damage. They pass the winter in a state of partial hibernation, waking up in fine, warm weather, when the provision laid up in the summer is made use of for food. They are monogamous, and the female produces three or four young, usually in June. In Lapland and Siberia they are killed in great numbers for the sake of their winter coat. This, though valuable, is inferior to the fur of the North American Gray Squirrel (S. carolinensis). [FLYING-SQUIRRELS.]

Farriery: A kind of palsy affecting the jaw of a horse.

stag-horned longicorn, s.

Entom.: Acanthophorus serraticornis, from south India.

stag-hound, s.

Zoölogy and Sporting:

1. The Scotch deer-hound, called also the Wolf-dog, a breed that is rapidly dying out. These dogs hunt chiefly by sight and are used for stalking deer, for which purpose a cross between the rough Scotch greyhound and colley or the fox-hound is also often employed. True stag-hounds are wiry-coated, shaggy, generally yellowish-gray, but the most valuable are dark iron-gray, with white breast. They are of undaunted courage and great speed, and should stand not less than twenty-eight inches high.

2. A breed of dogs hunting by scent. (See extract.)

"The modern Stag-hound is a tall Fox-hound of about 25 inches in height. The ancient breed is quite extinct; it was, I believe, last used in the Devon and Somerset pack, to hunt the wild red deer. The old hounds have often been described to me as large white and yellow dogs of the old Talbot-breed. They were heavy and slow, but able, from their exquisite scenting powers, to give the stag a grace of an hour or more, and kill him afterward. The music of their tongues is spoken of as magnificent. In hunting water they were perfect."—Meyrick: House Dogs and Sporting Dogs, pp. 21, 22.

"When the game was not to be run down with horse and hound, various stratagems were used to get within shooting reach of it by the pedestrian huntsmen, the chief of which was called the stalking-horse. This was a canvas figure, resembling a horse in the act of grazing; and so light that it could be carried in one hand. Sometimes the figure represented a cow, stag, or other common animal; and under cover of this the sportsmen stole so nigh the game, that they could easily bring it down with shaft or bullet."—Knight: Pictorial Hist. Eng., ii. 887.

2. Fig.: Anything thrust or put forward to conceal some more important object; a mask.

"Let the counsellor give counsel not for faction but for conscience, forbearing to make the good of the state the stalking-horse of his private ends."—Hakewill: On Providence, bk. iv., ch. xiv.

*5. The chief seat on the dais in a domestic hall.

6. A fixed seat in English churches or cathedrals, wholly or partially enclosed at the back, with elbows at the sides, and usually a ledge for books, and a kneeling-board in front. Stalls are generally of wood, occasionally of stone, enriched with sculptured foliage and figures, sometimes of a grotesque character; and in many cases each stall is covered with a rich canopy of tabernacle work; when there are two rows of stalls on each side, those in the hinder row only have canopies. In cathedrals and collegiate churches, the stalls are used by the canons and prebends. Sometimes there is a row of stalls for the choir, who occupy them because in some sort they fulfill part of the duties of the monks—the chanting of the divine office.

"The pope creates a canon beyond the number limited, and commands the chapter to assign unto such canon a stall in the choir and place in the chapter."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

7. A canonry or prebend. (Eng.)

8. A high-class seat in a theater, between the pit (where it exists) and the orchestra. (Eng.)

stā'-mēn (1), (pl. stā'-mēns in sense II., stām'-in-a in the other senses), s. [Lat. stamen (pl. stamina)=the warp in an upright loom, a thread; lit.=that which stands up, from sto=to stand (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A thread, especially a thread of the warp; the warp in the ancient upright loom at which the weaver stood upright, instead of sitting.

2. (Pl.): The fixed, firm part of a body, which supports it or gives it strength and solidity.

3. Hence (pl.) that which constitutes the principal strength or support of anything; power of endurance; staying power, vigor, backbone.

*4. A first principle; an essential part.

"Some few of the main stamina, or chief lines, were taken care of from the first, and made up the first creeds."
—Waterland: Works, iv. 309.

II. Bot.: The male organ of a flower, called by the old botanists an apex and a chive. Morphologically, it is a transformed leaf. It consists of a filament, an anther, and pollen. The last two are essential, the first is not. When anther and pollen are wanting, the stamen is called sterile or abortive. If the stamens are equal in number to the petals, then normally they alternate with them. When opposite, as in the primrose, it is supposed that the stamens are the second of two rows, of which the first has not been developed. When the stamens are twice as numerous as the petals, and are arranged in a circle, as in Silene, it is believed that they really constitute two rows of five each, though they look like a single row. They always originate from the space between the base of the petals and the base of the ovary, but they may cohere with other organs, whence the terms Epigynous, Hypogynous, and Perigynous (q.v.). Cohesion among themselves may make them Monadelphous, Diadelphous, or Polyadelphous (q.v.). They may be on different flowers, or even different plants, from the pistils, whence the terms Monœcious or Diœcious (q.v.). Other terms used of stamens are exserted, included, declinate, didynamous, and tetradynamous (q.v.). In the Linnæan or Artificial System of arrangement, most of the classes are framed on the number of the stamens. [LINNÆAN-SYSTEM.] The stamens taken collectively form the Andrœceum or male apparatus of the flower.

Stamens.

stā'-mēn (2), s. [STAMIN.]

stā'-mēned, a. [Eng. stamen (1); -ed.]

Bot.: Furnished with stamens. (Often in composition.)

B. As adj.: Characterized by spasmodic, hesitating, or defective speech; apt to stammer or stutter; hesitating in speech.

"The Pythian grape we dry; Lagean juice Will stammering tongues and staggering feet produce."
Dryden: Virgil; Georgic ii. 133.

C. As substantive:

Pathol.: A defect of utterance which renders one unable, especially when excited, to pronounce certain syllables. It is much more common in men than in women. It does not generally appear till about the fifth, and often culminates about the tenth year. Though there may be organic defect, the fact that it varies in intensity at different times shows that it is chiefly functional. Practice in slow, deliberate, and careful enunciation tends to diminish it, and the more one can gain self-possession in speaking the more likely is the defect to disappear altogether.

stām'-mēr-īng-ly, adv. [Eng. stammering; -ly.] In a stammering manner; with a stammer or hesitation in speech.

stāmp, stampe, v. t. & i. [A. S. stampan; cogn. with Dan. stampen; Icel. stappa; Sw. stampa; Dan. stampen; Ger. stampfen; O. Fr. estamper; French étamper; Gr. stembō; Sansc. stambh=to make firm or hard; O. H. Ger. stamph=a pestle for pounding; Ital. stampare=to stamp; Sp. estampar.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A flag or ensign round which men rally, or under which they unite for a common purpose; a flag or carved symbolical figure, &c., erected on a long pole or staff, serving as a rallying-point or the like. The ancient military standard consisted of a symbol carried on a pole like the Roman eagle, which may be considered as their national standard. Each cohort had its own standard, by which it was known, and which was surmounted with a figure of Victory, an open hand, &c., the pole being decorated with circular medallions, crescents, &c. The Labarum was the peculiar standard adopted by Constantine. [LABARUM.] In mediæval times the standard was not square, like the banner, but elongated, like the guidon and pennon, but much larger, becoming narrow and rounded at the end, which was slit, unless the standard belonged to a prince of the blood-royal. The size of the standard was regulated by the rank of the person whose arms it bore: that of an emperor was 11 yards long; of a king, 9 yards; of a prince, 7 yards; a marquis, 6½ yards; an earl, 6 yards; a viscount or baron, 5 yards; a knight-banneret, 4½ yards; and a baronet, 4 yards. It was generally divided into three portions—one containing the arms of the knight, then came his cognizance or badge, and then his crest; these being divided by bands, on which was inscribed his war-cry or motto, the whole being fringed with his livery or family colors. Cavalry standards are properly banners, of a small size. The corresponding flags used by infantry regiments are called colors.

"Knights bannerets are made in the field, with the ceremony of cutting of the point of his standert, & making it as it were a banner."—Smith: Commonwealth, bk. i., ch. xviii.

2. That which is capable of satisfying certain defined conditions fixed by the proper authorities; especially that which is established by the competent authority as a rule or measure of quantity; the original weight or measure sanctioned by government, and deposited in some public place, to be used in regulating, adjusting, and trying weights and measures used in traffic. [MEASURE, WEIGHT.]

"It is therefore necessary to have recourse to some visible, palpable, material standard; by forming a comparison with which, all weights and measures may be reduced to one uniform size; and the prerogative of fixing this standard our ancient law vested in the crown."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. i., ch. 7.

Roman Standards.

1. The most ancient form; a handful of hay or fern fixed to the top of a spear; hence, the company was called Manipulus.
2. Later ensign of a Manipule, called Numina legionum.
3. Ensign of Manipule of still later date; the eagle, wolf, minotaur, horse, and bear were used as emblems.
4. In the second consulship of Marius (B. C. 104), he adopted the eagle only.
5. The ball, emblematic of dominion.
6. The bronze figure of Victory.
7. A square cloth attached to a pole, bearing the letters S. P. Q. R. (Senatus Populusque Romanus)=the Senate and people of Rome, i. e., the State, the Republic; 5, 6, or 7 was sometimes substituted for the eagle under the later emperors.
8. Standard of a cohort; each cohort had its own device emblazoned on a square piece of cloth attached to a crossbar, and elevated on a gilt staff.
9. Vexillum or standard of the Cavalry.

3. That which is established as a rule or model, by the authority of public opinion, or by respectable opinions, or by custom or general consent; that which serves as a test, gauge, or measure.

"Labor alone, therefore, never varying in its own value, is alone the ultimate and real standard by which the value of all commodities can at all times and places be estimated and compared."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. i., ch. v.

4. A certain degree of advancement, progress, proficiency, &c., to which one must attain to meet certain requirements; as, The standard of height in infantry regiments is 5 ft. 5 in.

*5. A candlestick of large size, standing on the ground, and having branches for several lights.

6. A measuring device for men or horses; the first expressed in feet and inches, the latter in hands and inches.

7. In the same sense as II. 4.

*8. One who remains or stays long in the same place or position.

9. Vehicles: An upright rising from the end of the bolster to hold the wagon-body laterally.

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Having a permanent quality; capable of satisfying certain conditions fixed by a competent authority; fixed, settled; as, standard weight, standard measure, &c.

2. Hort.: Not trained on a wall; standing by itself; as, a standard pear-tree, a standard rose, &c.

standard-bearer, subst. An officer of an army, company, or troop that bears a standard.

standard-gauge, s. A gauge for verifying the dimensions, or any particular dimension, of articles, or their component parts, which are made in large numbers, and required to be of uniform size.

standard-knee, s. [STANDARD, s., II. 8.]

standard-piles, s. pl.

Hydr.-eng.: Piles placed at regular intervals apart and connected by runners.

stānd'-ard, v. t. [STANDARD, s.] (See extract.)

"To standard gold or silver is to convert the gross weight of either metal, whose fineness differs from the standard, into its equivalent weight of standard metal."—Bitheil: Counting-House Dict.

stānd'-ard-ize, v. t. [English standard; -ize.] To bring up to, or recognize as, a standard.

stānd'-ēe, s. [Eng. stand; -ee.] A standing bed-place in a steamboat, or standing room in a theater. (U. S. Colloq.)

stānd'-el, *stānd'-ell, s. [STAND.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A tree of long standing.

"Care was taken . . . for the preserving of the standells of beech."—Fuller: Worthies, Buckinghamshire.

2. Eng. Law: A young store oak-tree, twelve of which were to be left in every acre of wood at the felling thereof.

stānd'-el-wōrt, *stand-el-worte, stānd'-ēr-wōrt, s. [Eng. standel, and wort; cf. Ger. stendelwurz=spotted orchis.]

Botany: Various Orchids, spec. Orchis mascula (Britten & Holland.)

stānd'-ēr, s. [Eng. stand; -er.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who stands.

*2. A tree that has long stood.

"The fairest standers of all were rooted up and cast into the fire."—Ascham: Schoolmaster, bk. ii.

3. A supporter.

"The old standers and professors of the sect."—Berkley: Alciphron, ii. § 37.

*II. Church Hist. (pl.): A class of penitents in the early Church, when public penance was practiced. When the other penitents, energumens, and catechumens had been dismissed, the standers were allowed to remain and join in the prayers and witness the oblation, but could not partake of the Eucharist. Called also Bystanders, Costanders, and, in ecclesiastical Latin, Consistentes.

stander-by, s. One who stands by; a bystander, a spectator.

"Were her antics play'd in the eye Of a thousand standers-by."

Wordsworth: Kitten and the Falling Leaves.

stander-up, s. One who takes a side.

stānd'-ēr-grass, s. [Eng. stander, and grass.] Standelwort (q. v.). (Beaum. & Flet.: Faithful Shepherdess, ii. 2.)

stānd'-ēr-wōrt, s. [STANDELWORT.] (Prior.) stānd'-ing, *stand-and, *stand-yng, *stond-yng, *stond-yng, pr. par., a. & s. [STAND, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Erect; in an upright position; not sitting, kneeling, or lying.

2. Remaining erect; not cut down; as, standing corn.

3. Fixed; not movable.

"His standing bed and truckle bed."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iv. 5.

4. Established either by law or custom; continuously existing; not temporary.

"The name of standing army was long held in abhorrence."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

5. Lasting, permanent; not transitory; not fugitive; as, a standing color.

6. Stagnant; not flowing; as, standing water.

7. A term applied to a relatively stationary portion of an object which has several parts, one or more of them moving; as, the standing leaf of a hinge, that attached to the post; the standing part of a rope, the main portion around which the end is hitched; the standing pulley of a compound system, that attached to a permanent object.

C. As substantive:

1. The act or state of being erect or upright; a being or becoming erect or upright.

"Standing upright of the hair is caused, for that by the shutting of the pores of the skin, the hair that lieth aslope must needs rise."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 713.

2. Position, place, stand.

"Your cavalcade the fair spectators view,
From their high standings, yet look up to you."
Dryden: To His Sacred Majesty.

3. Continuance, duration, existence.

"This tract of land is as old, and of as long a standing, as any upon the continent of Africa."—Woodward.

4. Possession of an office, position, character, or place.

5. Power to stand. (Psalm xlix. 2.)

6. Condition or position in society; rank, reputation; as, a man of high standing.

standing-army, s. [ARMY ¶ (f).]

standing-block, s.

Naut.: That block of a tackle or purchase which is attached to a stationary object, in contradistinction to the block which moves as the fall is hauled in or paid out. [RUNNING-BLOCK.]

standing-buddle, s.

Mining: A trough filled with water, in which pieces of lead ore are placed and stirred with a shovel.

standing-orders, s. pl. [ORDER, s., ¶.]

standing-part, s.

1. (Of a hook): The part attached to a block or chain, by which power is brought to bear upon it.

2. (Of a rope or tackle): The part made fast to the object, in contradistinction to the fall or part pulled upon.

standing-press, s. A heavy press for bookbinders or other trades.

standing-rigging, s.

Naut.: The fixed ropes and chains whereby the masts and bowsprit are stayed securely. [RUNNING-RIGGING.]

standing-stones, s. pl.

Archæology: A generic name for menhirs, cromlechs, &c., without reference to the purpose for which they were erected.

"The remarkable groups of standing-stones in India are in many cases at least set up for each stone to represent or embody a deity."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 163.

stānd'-ish, s. [Eng. stand, and dish.] A stand or case for pen and ink.

"A standish, steel and golden pen."

Pope: On Receiving a Standish and Pens.

stāne, stāine, s. [STONE, s.] (Scotch.)

stane-raw, staney-rag, s.

Botany: Parmelia saxatilis, var. omphalodes. [CROTTLE, SKROTTA.]

stān'-ēk-ite, subst. [Named by Dana after J. Stanek, who analyzed it; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A resin-like substance separated by boiling alcohol from pyroretin (q. v.). Composition: Carbon, 76.97; hydrogen, 7.24; oxygen, 15.79=100.

stāng (1), stange, *stāngue, s. [Icel. stōng (genit. stangar)=a pole, a stake; A. S. steng; Dan. stang; Sw. stång; Dut. stang; Ger. stange; from the pa. t. of sting (q. v.); cf. Icel. stanga=to goad.] *1. A long pole, a shaft, a stake.

"He has braw braid shouthers, and I just took the measure o' them wi' the stang."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. xvii.

2. A pole, rod, or perch; a measure of land.

"These fields were intermingled with woods of half a stang, and the tallest tree appeared to be seven feet high."—Swift: Gulliver; Lilliput, ch. ii.

*3. A tooth, a tusk.

"They lik the twynkilland stangis in thar hed."

G. Douglas: Virgil's Æneid, ii.

¶ To ride the stang: To be carried on a pole on men's shoulders, in derision; a punishment inflicted on wife or husband beaters, or the like. (Scotch.)

Project.: Two half-balls united by a bar; a bar-shot.

stāng (2), s. [STANG, v.] A sting. (Scotch.)

stang-fish, s. (See extract.)

"Whilst, from disagreeable sensations produced by handling most of them, they [the jelly-fishes] have been called Sea-nettles, Stingers, or Stang-fishes."—T. Rymer Jones. Animal Kingdom, p. 74.

stāng, v. t. & i. [From stang, old pa. t. of sting (q. v.).]

A. Trans.: To sting. (Scotch.)

B. Intrans.: To shoot with pain. (Prov.)

stān'-hōpe (1), subst. [From the name of the deviser.] A light, two-wheeled carriage without a top; a sporting phaëton.

"Broughams and wagonettes, stanhopes and barouches, filled with strangely assorted company."—London Daily Telegraph.

stān'-hōpe (2), s. [See def.]

Printing: An iron press invented by Lord Stanhope, and completed in 1800. It was a great improvement on the old wooden presses, and the modern presses now in use are only improvements on it. Called also Stanhope-press.

stanhope-lens, s.

Optics: A magnifying lens consisting of two convex surfaces of dissimilar curves, separated by a considerable thickness of glass so adjusted that when the more convex surface is next the eye, small objects on the other surface are in focus.

stanhope-press, s. [STANHOPE (2).]

stān'-iēl (i as y), stān'-yēl, s. [STANNEL.] The kestrel.

"With what wing the stanyel checks at it."

Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, ii. 5.

stān'-iēl-rȳ (i as y), subst. [Eng. staniel; -ry.] The act or practice of hawking with staniels; ignoble falconry.

"That panny, pin-feathered ayry of buzardism and stanielry."—Lady Alimony, sign. I. 4.

stā'-nī-ūm, s. [Low Latin.] A kind of strong cloth of a superior quality worn during the Anglo-Norman period; called also Stamfordis.

stānk, a. [STANCK.]

stānk, v. i. [Sw. stanka.] To sigh. (Prov.)

†stānk, pret. of v. [STINK.]

stānk, stanc, subst. [O. Fr. estang, from Latin stagnum=a pool of stagnant water; Sp. estangue; Port. tangue; Ital. stagnò. Stank and tank are doublets.] A pool, a tank.

"They lighted and abiden beside a water stank."

Robert de Brunne, p. 68.

stānk, stāñck, v. t. [STANK, s.]

1. To dam up.

"Stanck up the salt conduits of mine eyes."

Fletcher.

2. To make a well water-tight.

Stān'-leŷ, s. [See def. of compound.]

Stanley-crane, s.

Ornith.: Anthropoides stanleyanus, from the East Indies. It is about forty inches long, general plumage bluish. Named by Vigors in honor of Lord Stanley, afterward thirteenth Earl of Derby, England (1775-1851).

Stān'-leŷ-an, a. [Eng. Stanley (q. v.); -an.] Of or belonging to the thirteenth Earl of Derby, in whose menagerie at Knowsley, near Liverpool, England, the species was first recognized.

Stanleyan-deerlet, s.

Zoöl.: Tragulus stanleyanus. [TRAGULUS.]

stān'-march, subst. [A. S. stān=stone, and Mid. Eng. marche=parsley.]

Bot.: Smyrnum olusatrum.

stān-nām'-ŷl, s. [Eng. stann(um), and amyl.]

Chem. (pl.): Compounds produced by the action of amyl iodide on an alloy of sodium and tin. The product contains the three compounds, $\text{Sn}^{\text{II}}(\text{C}_5\text{H}_{11})_2$, $\text{Sn}^{\text{III}}_2(\text{C}_5\text{H}_{11})_6$, and $\text{Sn}^{\text{IV}}(\text{C}_5\text{H}_{11})_4$, homologous with the stannethyls. They are all unctuous masses, and do not fume in the air, insoluble in water, soluble in ether; and more soluble in alcohol in proportion as they contain less tin. The stannamyls reduce silver solutions, and are oxidized by nitric acid.

stān'-nār-ŷ, *stān'-nōr-ŷ, a. & s. [Low Lat. stannaria=a tin-mine, from Lat. stannum=tin, an alloy of silver and lead; cf. Cornish stean; Welsh ystaen; Bret. stean; Ir. stan; Gael. staoín; Manx stainney=tin.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to tin-mines.

"The stannary courts in Devonshire and Cornwall, for the administration of justice among the tinners therein, are also courts of record, but of the same private and exclusive nature."—Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. iii, ch. 6.

B. As subst.: A tin-mine, tin-works. The term is generally used to include in one general designation all the tin-mines within a certain district, the miners employed in working them, and the customs and privileges attached to the mines and those employed in them.

"If by public law the mint were ordained to be onely supplied by our stannaries, how currently would they pass for more precious than silver mines?"—Bp. Hall: Select Thoughts.

stān'-nāte, s. [Eng. stann(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of stannic acid.

stannate of potassium, s.

Chem.: K_2SnO_3 . Prepared by dissolving stannic acid in potash-ley, and evaporating over sulphuric acid. It is gummy, noncrystallizable, and strongly alkaline, very soluble in water, but insoluble in alcohol.

stannate of sodium, s.

Chem.: Na_2SnO_3 . Prepared by dissolving stannic acid in soda-ley, and evaporating over sulphuric acid. It is a crystallo-granular body, and is less soluble in warm than in cold water, insoluble in alcohol. Used in calico-printing as a mordant, chiefly for mixtures of wool and cotton.

stān'-nēl, *stān'-yēl, *stān'-nēl, s. [Prob. a corrupt. of stand-gale, from the habit which the bird has of sustaining itself in one position, with its head to the wind, by a rapid motion of the wings; cf. its other name, Wind-hover.] The Kestrel (q. v.). Called also Staniel, Stanyel, Stannyel, Stone-gale.

"To prevent this daunger, therefore, the doves need to have with them the bird which is called Tinnunculus, i. e., a kestrell, or stannell."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xx, ch. xxxvii.

stānn-ē-thŷl, s. [Eng. stann(um), and ethyl.]

Chem. (pl.): Ethyl compounds of tin. Three of these are at present known; viz., stannous ethide, $\text{Sn}^{\text{II}}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_2$, stannoso-stannic ethide, $\text{Sn}^{\text{III}}_2(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_6$, and stannic ethide $\text{Sn}^{\text{IV}}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_4$, the first and second acting as organic radicles, capable of uniting with chlorine, bromine, oxygen, &c., and the third being a saturated compound.

stān'-nīc, a. [Eng. stann(um); -ic.] Contained in or derived from tin.

Chem.: H_2SnO_3 . Obtained by adding barium or calcium carbonate, not in excess, to a solution of stannic chloride. When recently precipitated, it is gelatinous; but after drying in the air, it forms hard translucent lumps like gum-arabic. It dissolves in the stronger acids forming stannic salts, and forms easily-soluble salts with the alkali metals.

stannic-chloride, s. [TIN-TETRACHLORIDE.]

stannic-ethide, s.

Chem.: $\text{Sn}^{\text{IV}}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_4$. Stannotetrethyl. A transparent colorless liquid obtained by the distillation of stannous ethide. It has a faint ethereal odor and metallic taste, specific gravity 1.19, boils at 181°, and is very inflammable, burning with a dark blue-edged flame. It dissolves iodine with a brown color, which gradually disappears.

stannic-oxide, s. [TIN-DIOXIDE.]

stān-nīf-ēr-ōūs, a. [Lat. stannum=tin, and fero=to bear, to produce.] Producing or containing tin.

"The further addition of the oxide of tin produces an enamel of an opaque white of great purity, which is the characteristic glazing of stanniferous or tin-glazed wares."—Fortnum: Majolica, p. 4.

stān'-nīne, stān'-nīte, s. [Latin stann(um)=tin; suff. -ine, -ite (Min.); Fr. étain sulfuré; Ger. zinnkies.]

Mineralogy:

1. An ore of tin, now of rare occurrence, but formerly found in a few mines of Cornwall in fair quantity. Crystallization undetermined, but probably tetragonal; found mostly massive. Hardness, 4.0; specific gravity 4.3-4.5; luster, metallic; streak, blackish; color, steel-gray, sometimes with a bluish tarnish; opaque; brittle. Composition: Sulphur, 29.6; tin, 27.2; copper, 29.3; iron, 6.5; zinc, 7.5=100.1.

2. Under the name Stannite, Breithaupt has described an amorphous pale-yellow mineral, which, with much tin oxide, contains also much silica. Now shown to be quartz, in which finely divided cassiterite (q. v.) is mechanically suspended.

stānn-mē-thŷl, s. [English stann(um), and methyl.]

Chem. (pl.): Methyl compounds of tin. Compounds analogous in constitution to the stannethyls, and resembling them generally in their properties and modes of formation. Three of these are known, viz., stannous methide, $\text{Sn}^{\text{II}}(\text{CH}_3)_2$, stannoso-stannic methide, $\text{Sn}^{\text{III}}_2(\text{CH}_3)_6$, and stannic methide $\text{Sn}^{\text{IV}}(\text{CH}_3)_4$.

stān-nō, pref. [Lat. stannum=tin.] Of, pertaining to, or consisting more or less of tin.

stān-nō-dī-ē-thŷl, s. [Pref. stanno-, and Eng. diethyl.] [STANNOS-ETHIDE.]

stān-nō-sō, pref. [Mod. Lat. stannosus=full of tin.] Pertaining to tin, largely consisting of tin.

stannoso-stannic chloride, s. [TINSESQUICHLORIDE.]

stannoso-stannic ethide, s.

Chem.: $\text{Sn}^{\text{III}}_2(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_6$. Stannotriethyl. A slightly yellow refractive oil obtained by digesting an alloy of sodium and tin with ethyl iodide, exhausting the mass with ether, evaporating the ethereal solution, and washing the residue with alcohol. It has a peculiar odor, resembling that of rotten fruit, is insoluble in water and alcohol, soluble in ether, and boils at 180°.

stān-nō-tē-trēth'-ŷl, s. Pref. stanno-, and Eng. tetrethyl.] [STANNIC-ETHIDE.]

stān-nō-trī-ē-thŷl, s. [Pref. stanno-, and Eng. triethyl.] [STANNOSO-STANNIC ETHIDE.]

stān'-nō-tŷpe, s. [Lat. stannum=tin, and Eng. type.]

Photog.: A picture taken upon a tinned iron plate.

stān'-noūs, adj. [Lat. stannum=tin.] Of, pertaining to, or containing tin.

stannous-chloride, s. [TIN-DICHLORIDE.]

stannous-ethide, s.

Chem.: $\text{Sn}^{\text{II}}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_2$. Stannodiethyl. A thick yellowish oil obtained by heating ethyl iodide and tin-foil in a sealed glass tube to 160°, and decomposing the resulting iodide with sodium of zinc. It has a pungent odor, is insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, specific gravity 1.558, does not solidify at -12°, and cannot be distilled without decomposition.

stannous-oxide, s. [TIN-MONOXIDE.]

stān'-nūm, s. [Lat. =tin.] [TIN.]

stānt, v. i. [For standeth, 3d pers. sing. pres. indic. of stand.]

stān-tiēn'-ite, s. [Etym. doubtful, but probably after a Mr. Stantien; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A black resin found in glauconitic sands in East Prussia. Specific gravity 1.175. Composition: Carbon, 71.02; hydrogen, 8.15; oxygen, 20.83=100. Insoluble in benzine, alcohol, &c.

stān'-tion, s. [STEMSON.]

stān'-za, *stāñce, *stāñze, *stān'-zō, s. [Ital. stanza; O. Ital. stantia=a lodging, a dwelling, a stanza, from Low Lat. stantia=an abode, from Lat. stans, pr. par. of sto=to stand; Fr. stance; Sp. & Port. estancia.]

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aʃ; expect, Xenophon, exíst. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhün; ðion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = beł, ðel.

1. Poetry: A number of lines or verses regularly adjusted to each other, and properly ending in a full point or pause; a part of a poem ordinarily containing every variety of measure in that poem; a combination or arrangement of lines usually recurring, whether like or unlike in measure. A stanza is variously termed Terzina, Quartetto, Sestina, Ottava, &c., according as it consists of three, four, six, eight, &c., lines.

"Therefore (but not without new-fashioning the whole frame) I chose Ariosto's stanza, of all other the most compleat and best-proportioned, consisting of eight; six interwoven or alternate, and a couplet in base."—Drayton: Barons' Wars. (Pref.)

*2. Arch.: An apartment or division in a building; a room or chamber.

stān-zā'-ic, a. [Eng. stanza; -ic.] Pertaining or relating to a stanza or stanzas; consisting of or arranged as stanzas.

"That revolt against all stanzaic law for which he was afterward to become so famous."—Athenæum, Feb. 25, 1882.

stānz'-ā-ite (z astz), s. [After Stanzen, Bavaria, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as ANDALUSITE (q. v.).

stā-pē-dī-āl, a. [Low Lat. stapes=a stirrup.] Stirrup-shaped.

stā-pē-dī-ūs, s. [Mod Lat., from Low Lat. stapes (q. v.).]

Anat.: A muscle of the ear, lying in a small cavity of the os petrosum and inserted into the head of the stapes. It is governed by fibers from the facial nerve, tightens the tympanic membrane, and is supposed to regulate the movements of the stapes.

stā-pē-lī-ā, s. [Named by Linnæus after John Bodæus Stapel, who died in 1636. He was a physician at Amsterdam, and wrote a commentary on Theophrastus.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Stapelieæ (q. v.). Corolla rotate, five-cleft, fleshy, containing inside it a double staminal corona of leaves or lobes; odor of the flowers like that of carrion; stems succulent. The branches are generally four-sided and toothed, without leaves. More than a hundred species are known, from the Cape of Good Hope. Some are cultivated in greenhouses on account of the beauty of their flowers.

stā-pē-lī-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. stapeli(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Asclepiadaceæ.

stā'-pēs, s. [Low Lat.=a stirrup.]

1. Anat.: The third and innermost bone of the ear, named from its form. It is composed of a head, a base, and two crura. It is the auditory ossicle, which is joined to the fenestra ovalis, and corresponds with the columella in Sauropsida.

2. Surg.: A bandage for the foot, making a figure-of-8 round the ankle.

stāph-īs-ā-grī-ā, s. [Lat. staphis; Gr. staphis = (1) a raisin, (2) stavesacre (see def.), and agrios=living in the fields, wild.]

Pharm.: The seed of Delphinium staphisagria, the Stavesacre, or Licebane (q. v.). It appears to act as an emetic, purgative, and anthelmintic. A powder or ointment of it applied externally destroys vermin.

stāph-īs-ā-grīc, a. [Eng. staphisagria (ia); -ic.] Contained in or derived from staphisagria (q. v.).

Chem.: A peculiar acid, said to exist in the seeds of Delphinium staphisagria. It is white, crystalline, and sublimable, and possesses emetic properties.

stāph-īs-ā-grīne, s. [English staphisagria (ia); -ine.]

Chem.: Staphisaine. An alkaloid extracted from the seeds of Delphinium staphisagria by alcohol. It has a slightly yellowish color and a sharp taste, is insoluble in water and ether, very soluble in alcohol, and dissolves in acids, but without neutralizing them.

stāph-īs-ā-ine, s. [STAPHISAGRINE.]

stāph-ī-lē, s. [Gr.=a bunch of grapes.]

Anat.: The uvula.

stāph-ī-lē-ā, s. [Abridged from Gr. staphylo-dendron=the bladder-nut.]

Bot.: Bladder-nut (q. v.); the typical genus of Staphyleaceæ (q. v.). The branches of Staphylea emodi are made into the "serpent-sticks" which are sold by the Afghans and the Indian hill tribes, it being supposed that they possess the property of keeping off snakes.

stāph-īl-ē-ā-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin staphyle(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Botany: Bladder-nuts; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Sapindales, sometimes reduced to a section of Celastraceæ. Leaves pinnate, with common and partial deciduous stipules; flowers in terminal, stalked racemes; sepals five, colored, imbricate; petals five, inserted in or around a crenate, saucer-shaped disk; stamens five, styles two or three, cohering at the base; ovary two or three-celled, with the carpels more or less distinct; ovules several; fruit membranous or fleshy; seeds ascending, roundish. Known genera, three; species, fourteen, widely distributed.

stāph-ī-līnē, a. [Greek staphylē=a bunch of grapes.]

stāph-ī-līn'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin staphylin(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: Rove-beetles: Devil's Coach-horses; the typical family of the section Brachelytra (q. v.). Some recent entomologists make it the only family of the section, and divide it into eleven sub-families, with about 5,000 species. These are spread over the world, occurring in the dung of animals, in decaying animal and vegetable matter, under the bark of trees, in fungi, in ants' nests, &c. They fly abroad in large numbers in warm evenings after sunset. Their larvae more nearly resemble the adults than in other Coleoptera, showing their rank in the order to be low. (Bates, in Cassell's Nat. Hist.) stāph-ī-lī-nūs, s. [Lat., from Gr. staphylinos = (1) a kind of carrot or parsnip; (2) a beetle.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Staphylinidæ (q. v.). Labrum fissile; tarsi always pentamerous. They are the largest of the family, and are predaceous.

stāph-ī-lō-cōc'-çi, s. pl. [Gr. staphylē=a bunch of grapes, and kokkos=a berry.] Spherical bacteria that appear in clusters or bunches. [BACTERIUM.]

stāph-ī-lō-cōc'-cus, s. [STAPHYLOCOCCI.] An individual of the Staphylococci (q. v.). [SUPPURATION.]

stāph-ī-lō-mā, s. [Lat., from Gr. staphylōma; staphylē=a bunch of grapes, to which the diseased portion of the eye sometimes bears a remote resemblance.]

Pathol.: The protrusion of part of the eyeball beyond its natural position. When the affection has its seat in the cornea it is called Staphyloma corneæ; when in the sclerotica, S. sclerotice. It may arise from the ulceration of the cornea, or from the effusion of fluid behind the lens of the eyeball. Called also Staphylosis.

stāph-ī-lō-plās-tic, a. [Eng. staphyloplast (y); -ic.] Of or relating to staphyloplasty (q. v.).

stāph-ī-lō-plās-tī, subst. [Gr. staphylē=the uvula, and plassō=to mold, to form.]

Surg.: The operation for replacing the soft palate when it has been lost.

stāph-ī-lōr'-ā-phic, a. [Eng. staphyloraph (y); -ic.] Of or relating to staphyloraphy (q. v.).

stāph-ī-lōr'-ā-phī, s. [Gr. staphylē=the uvula, and rhaphē=a suture; rhaptō=to sew.]

Surg.: The operation of uniting a cleft palate.

stāph-ī-lō-sis, s. [STAPHYLOMA.]

stāph-ī-lō-tōme, s. [Gr. staphylē=the uvula, and tomē=a cutting.]

Surg.: A knife for operating upon the uvula or palate.

stāph-ī-lōt'-ō-mī, s. [STAPHYLOTOME.]

Surg.: Amputation of the uvula.

stā'-ple, sta-pel, sta-pil, stap-ylle, s. & a. [O. Fr. estaple, estape (Fr. étape)=a staple or mart, from Low German stapel=a heap, a storehouse of wares; Dut. stapel=a staple, a pile; Dan. stabel=a hinge, a pile; Sw. stapel=a pile, a heap; Ger. stapel=a slip, a staple; stapel=a pile, a heap. The meaning A. I. 7 is directly from A. S. stapul=a prop.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A prop, a foundation, a support.

*2. A heap of goods or wares; hence a settled or established mart or market; an emporium; a town where certain wares were chiefly taken for sale. In England, formerly, the king's staple was established in certain ports or towns, and certain goods could not be exported without being first brought to these ports to be rated and charged with the duty payable to the king or public. The principal commodities on which customs were levied were wool, skins, and leather, and these were originally the staple commodities.

"Bruges . . . was the great staple for both Mediterranean and Northern merchandise."—Hallam: Middle Ages, ch. ix., pt. ii.

*3. A mart, a market, a place of production.

4. The commodities sold at a mart; hence the principal commodity grown, manufactured, or produced in any country, district, or town, either for exportation or home consumption.

5. The material or substance of anything; raw or unmanufactured material.

6. The thread or pile of wool, cotton, or flax.

7. The principal element or ingredient in anything; the chief constituent; the main part, the chief item.

8. A bow or loop of metal bent and formed with two points for driving into wood, to hold a hook, pin, bolt, &c.

"He gan the strong gates hew and break;

From whens he bet the staples out of brass."

Surrey: Virgil's Æneid, ii.

*9. A district, especially one granted to an abbey.

"He also graunted libertie of coynynge to certayne cities and abbeies, allowing them one staple, and two puncheons at a rate, with certayne restrictions."—Camden: Remaines; Money.

II. Technically:

1. Foundry: One of the pieces of nail-iron, a few inches long, on one end of which flat discs of thin sheet-iron are riveted.

2. Mining:

(1) A shaft uniting workings at different levels.

(2) A small pit.

B. As adjective:

*1. Pertaining to or being a staple or mart for commodities; as, a staple town.

*2. Established in commerce; settled.

"To ruin with worse ware our staple trade."

Dryden: Annus Mirabilis, ccvii.

*3. According to the laws of commerce; marketable; fit to be sold, &c.

"What needy writers would not solicit to work under such masters, who will take off their ware at their own rates, and trouble not themselves to examine whether it be staple or no?"—Swift.

4. Chief, principal, main; regularly produced or manufactured.

"The said three commodities [wool, skins, and leather] . . . were styled the staple commodities of the kingdom, because they were obliged to be brought to these ports where the king's staple was established in order to be there first rated, and then exported."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. i., ch. viii.

staple-knee, s. [STANDARD-KNEE.]

staple-punch, s. A punch with two points, used to prick blind-rods and slats to receive the staples which connect them.

stā'-ple, v. t. [STAPLE, s.] To sort and adjust the different staples of; as, to staple wool.

stā'-plēr, sta-pel-er, s. [Eng. stapl(e); -er.]

1. A dealer in staple commodities.

"Staplers and merchant-adventurers, the one residing constantly in one place, where they kept their magazine of wool, the other stirring, and adventuring to divers places abroad."—Howell: Letters, bk. i., let. 3.

2. One employed in assorting wool according to its staple.

star (1), starre, sterre, s. [A. S. sterra; cogn. with Dut. ster (in comp. sterre); O. H. Ger. sterro; Icel. stjarna; Sw. stjerna; Dan. stjerne; Goth. stairno; Ger. stern; Lat. stella (for sterula); Gr. astēr; Corn. & Shet. steren; Wel. seren; Sansc. tārā (for stārā), stri. From the same root as strew (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 2.

"[He] sow'd with stars the heav'n thick as a field."

Milton: P. L., vii. 358.

(2) Something resembling a star; specifically—
(a) An ornamental figure, having rays like a star, and worn upon the breast to indicate rank or honor. (Tennyson: Wellington, 196.)

(b) The series of radial spokes, forming handles, on the roller of a copperplate or lithographic printing-press.

(c) A reference mark (*) used in printing or writing as a reference to a note in the margin or at the foot, or to fill a blank where words or letters are omitted; an asterisk.

"Remarks worthy of riper observation, note with a marginal star."—Watts.

(d) A radiating crack or flaw, as in ice or glass. (Tennyson: Epic, 12.)

2. Fig.: A person of brilliant or preëminent qualities, especially in a public capacity, as a distinguished actor or singer.

II. Technically:

*1. Astrol.: A heavenly body supposed to have influence over a person's life; a configuration of the planets supposed to influence fortune.

¶ Hence the expressions, to thank one's stars, to be born under a lucky star, &c.

2. Astron.: The word star is popularly applied to any of the heavenly bodies, with the exception of the sun, the moon, and comets. Strictly speaking, the name is limited to the self-luminous bodies, constituted like the sun, and apparently maintaining a fixed position toward each other. [FIXED-STAR, STAR-DRIFT.] Till recently the hypothesis that the fixed stars, which are undoubtedly suns, are all surrounded by planets, was formed solely on the analogy of the solar system; now the discovery of an apparent planet revolving round Sirius (q. v.)

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

places it on a firmer basis. The fixed stars have long been grouped into constellations. [CONSTELLATION.] The apparent revolution of the celestial vault with all the constellations around a fixed point near Polaris, or the Pole Star (q. v.), is produced by the real rotation of the earth.

3. Billiards: In the game of pool, an additional life bought by a player who has already lost his three lives. In a game of less than eight players there is only one star. So called from the player's color on the scoring-board being marked with a small star. (Eng.)

"The star cannot be taken before the balls have done rolling."—Field, Jan. 23, 1886.

4. Fort: A small fort, having five or more points, or salient and reëntering angles flanking one another. Called also a Star-fort.

5. Her: An estoile; a charge frequently borne on the shield, differing from the mullet in having its rays or points waved instead of straight, and in having usually six of these points, while the mullet has only five. When the number is greater, the points are waved and straight alternately.

6. Pyrotechny: A small piece of inflammable composition, which burns with a colored flame.

*† 1. Order of the Star: An order of knighthood formerly existing in France, founded in 1350, in imitation of the Order of the Garter in England, then recently instituted.

2. Order of the Star of India: An order of knighthood instituted by the British government in February, 1861, to commemorate the direct assumption of the government of India by Queen Victoria, and subsequently enlarged in 1866, 1875, and 1876. It is conferred for services rendered to the Indian Empire, and consists of three classes:

(1) Knights Grand Commanders [G.C.S.I.]: Thirty members, eighteen native and twelve European, exclusive of the Governor-General, ex-officio Grand Master.

(2) Knights Commanders [K.C.S.I.], seventy-two.

(3) Companions [C.S.I.], 144.

3. Star of Bethlehem:

Bot.: (1) The genus Ornithogalum (q. v.), and spec. O. umbellatum; (2) Hypoxis decumbens; (3) Stellaria holostea; †(4) Hypericum calycinum; (5) applied to some species of Allium.

4. Star of Jerusalem:

Bot.: Tragopodon porrifolius and T. pratensis. Jerusalem is a corruption of Ital. Girasole, from its turning to the sun.

5. Star of Night:

Bot.: Clusea rosea.

6. Star of the earth:

Bot.: Plantago coronopus. Named because the leaves spread on the earth in star fashion. (Prior.)

7. Stars and Bars: The name given to the flag of the southern states during the American civil war.

8. Stars and Stripes: The familiar name of the flag of the United States.

† Star is largely used in compounds, the meaning being in most cases sufficiently obvious, as star-aspiring, star-bespangled, star-crowned, star-encircled, star-paved, star-roofed, star-sprinkled, &c.

star-anise, s.

Bot.: Illicium anisatum, a small tree of the order Magnoliaceæ, indigenous to China and Japan. The seeds resemble anise, whence the name. In India they are used medicinally, in Europe they are employed chiefly to flavor spirits.

Star-anise oil:

Chem.: A volatile oil extracted from the seeds and seed-capsules of Illicium anisatum. It has a pale yellow color and resembles anise oil in taste, odor, and nearly all of its reactions, but is more mobile, and remains liquid at +2°.

star-apple, s.

Bot.: The fruit of Chrysophyllum cainito. It is about the size of a large apple, with ten cells, and ten seeds disposed round the center. [CHRYSOPHYLLUM.]

star-bearers, s. pl. [BETHLEHEMITE, 3.]

star-blasting, subst. The supposed pernicious influence of the stars.

"Bless thee from whirlwinds, star-blasting, and taking."—Shakesp.: Lear, iii. 4.

Star Chamber, s.

Eng. Hist.: A court of civil and criminal jurisdiction at Westminster, England. As originally constituted it consisted of a committee of the Privy Council. When remodeled by Henry VIII., it consisted of four high officers of state, with power to add to their number a bishop and temporal lord of the council, and two justices of the courts at Westminster. It had jurisdiction in cases of forgery, perjury, riots, maintenance, fraud, libel, and conspiracy, and generally of every misdemeanor, especially those of public importance. It was exempt from the intervention of a jury, and had the power of inflicting any punishment short of death. Under Charles I. its jurisdiction was extended to cases properly belonging to the courts of common law, and its process was summary, and frequently iniquitous, the punishments inflicted being cruel and arbitrary, and mainly, if not solely, for the purpose of levying fines. It was abolished by the Statute 10 Charles I.

"That court of justice, so tremendous in the Tudor and part of the Stuart reign, the star-chamber, still keeps its name; which was not taken from the stars with which its roof is said to have been painted (which were obliterated even before the reign of Queen Elizabeth), but from the starra (Hebrew shetar) or Jewish covenants, which were deposited there by order of Richard I. in chests under three locks. No star was allowed to be valid except found in these repositories; here they remained till the banishment of the Jews by Edward I."—Pennant: London, p. 122.

Astron.: A spot or region of the sky thickly studded with stars. [CLUSTER, s., †; NEBULA.]

star-conner, star-cooner, s. One who cons or studies the stars; a stargazer, an astrologer.

"If Mars mooue warre, as star-cooners can tel,

And poets eke in fables use to faine."

Gascoigne: Fruites of Warre.

star-crossed, a. Not favored by the stars; unfortunate.

"A pair of star-crossed lovers."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet. (Prol.)

star-diamond, s.

Min.: A diamond, which, when viewed by transmitted light through one of the octahedral planes, displays a six-rayed star.

star-drift, s.

Astron.: (See extract.)

"It may, indeed, sometimes happen, as Mr. Proctor has pointed out, that stars in a certain region are animated with a common movement. In this phenomenon, which has been called star-drift by its discoverer, we have traces of a real movement shared in by a number of stars in a certain group."—Ball: Story of the Heavens, p. 483.

star-falling, s. [STAR-JELLY.]

star-finch, s.

Ornith.: The Redstart (q. v.).

star-fish, s.

1. Zoöl.: A popular name for any individual of the family Asteriadæ or Asteridæ (q. v.); applied specifically to the Common Star-fish, Asterias (Uraster) rubens, a familiar object on the Atlantic coasts. The body is more or less star-shaped, and consists of a central portion, or disc, surrounded by five or more lobes, or arms, radiating from the body and containing prolongations of the viscera; but in some forms the central disc extends so as to include the rays, rendering the animal pentagonal in shape. [See illustration under Asterias.] The integument is of a leathery texture, and is often strengthened by calcareous plates or spines. The mouth is situated in the center of the lower surface of the body, and the anus is either absent or on the upper surface. Locomotion is effected by means of peculiar tube-like processes [AMBULACRUM], which are protruded from the under-surface of the arms. The nervous system consists of a gangliated cord surrounding the mouth, and sending filaments to each of the arms. The young generally pass through a free larval stage [ECHINOPÆDIUM], and parthenogenesis seems to occur in Asterias. Star-fish are extremely voracious, and are very annoying to fishermen by devouring their bait. They possess in a high degree the power of reproducing lost members, and abound in all seas. [BRITTLE-STAR.]

2. Bot.: Stapelia asterias.

star-flower, s.

Bot.: (1) Borrago officinalis; (2) various species of Stellaria; (3) Ornithogalum umbellatum, from the stellate white flowers; (4) Trientalis americana.

star-fort, s.

Fort.: The same as STAR (1), II. 4.

star-fruit, s.

Botany: Actinocarpus damasonium, called also Damasonium stellatum. It is named from the radiated star-like fruit. [ACTINOCARRUS, DAMASONIUM.]

star-grass, s.

Bot.: (1) The genus Callitriche, named from the grassy appearance and stellate leaves; (2) Asperula odorata; (3) the genus Hypoxis; spec. H. erecta, a small plant, with grassy leaves and star-shaped yellow flowers; (4) the genus Aletris.

star-hawk, s. Prob. a mistake for Sparhawk = a Sparrow-hawk.

star-head, s.

Bot.: The genus Asterocephalus.

star-hyacinth, s.

Bot.: (1) Scilla autumnalis; (2) S. bifolia, named from the stellate look of the open flowers.

star-jelly, s.

Bot.: Nostoc commune, a trembling, gelatinous plant which springs up after rain. Called also Star-shoot, Star-shot, and Star-slough, from the old folk-superstition that it was part of the remains of a fallen star. (See extract for an obsolete hypothesis as to this plant.)

"The gelatinous substance known by the name of star-shot, or star-jelly, owes its origin to this bird, or some of the kind; being nothing but the half-digested remains of earthworms, on which these birds feed, and often discharge from their stomachs."—Pennant: British Zoölogy, vol. ii., p. 538.

star-light, s. & a. [STARLIGHT.]

star-lizard, s. [STELLION.]

star-map, s.

Astronomy: A map of the stars or constellations visible in a portion of the sky. The observer is supposed to be looking either due north or due south along the meridian of the place.

star-monger, s. An astrologer, a quack.

"A cobbler, star-monger, and quack."

Swift: Elegy on Partridge.

star-nose, s.

Zoöl.: Condylura cristata, the sole species of the genus. It is about five inches long, brownish-black in color, a little paler beneath. At the extremity of the elongated nose is a sort of fringe of about twenty long, fleshy processes, forming a regular star, with the nostrils in the center. Called also Star-nosed Mole.

star-nosed mole, s. [STAR-NOSE.]

star-pagoda, s. A gold coin of the East Indies. In Madras its value is 7s. 6d., or about $1.80.

star-proof, a. Impervious to the light of the stars.

"Under the shady roof

Of branching elm star-proof."

Milton: Arcades, 89.

star-read, star-rede, s. Knowledge of the stars.

"Egyptian wizards old,

Which in star-read were wont have best insight."

Spenser: F. Q., v. (Prol. 8.)

Star-reed, s.

Botany: Aristolochia fragrantissima. Its root is used in Peru against dysentery, malignant inflammatory fever, cold, rheumatism, &c.

star-ruby, s.

Min.: A variety of red corundum (q. v.), exhibiting a six-rayed star when cut en cabochon.

star-sapphire, s.

Min.: A variety of sapphire (q. v.), which, owing to an internal lamellar structure, shows, when cut en cabochon, a six-rayed star.

star-shake, s. A defect in timber, consisting in clefts radiating from the pith to the circumference.

star-shaped, a.

Bot.: Stellate (q. v.).

star-shoot, star-shot, s. [STAR-JELLY.]

star-slough, s. [STAR-JELLY.]

star-spangled, a. Spangled with stars: as, the star-spangled banner is the national flag of the United States.

star-spotted, a. Spotted or studded with, or as with stars.

star-stone, s. [STAR-SAPPHIRE.]

star-system, s. (See System, 3.)

star-tail, s.

Ornith.: Any individual of the genus Phaethon (q. v.).

"On account of its shrill cry, the sailors call it the boatswain-bird. They also call it by the name of star-tail, on account of the long projecting tail feathers."—Wood: Illus. Nat. Hist., ii. 756.

star-thistle, s.

Botany:

1. Centaurea calcitrapa, a European biennial plant, from one to two feet high, with interruptedly pinnatifid leaves, long spines, and rose-purple flowers. It is rare. [JERSEY STAR-THISTLE.]

2. Centaurea solstitialis.

star-types, s. The typical classes into which astronomers divide the fixed stars according to their spectra. They are: (1) the white or Sirian stars; (2) the yellow or solar stars; (3) the red and orange or variable stars; (4) the deep red stars. More than fifty stars have spectra different from any of these types, and they are known as the bright-line stars. Most of the stars in Orion exhibit a special variety of spectra seldom met with outside of that constellation.

bôll, bôy; pôut, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect. Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhün; -tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

star-wheel, s.

Horology.: A wheel having radial projections, which engage with a pin on the hour-wheel, employed in repeating clocks. Also used in meters and registers.

stars and bars, s. The flag of the ex-Southern Confederacy. It was merely an adaptation of the stars and stripes, having three "alternate stripes, red and white," instead of thirteen such stripes, and a circle of white stars on a blue field, corresponding to the number of states of the confederacy.

stars and stripes, s. The national flag of the United States of America. For its history and full description see FLAG (1), s.

star (2), shtarr, s. [Mod. Lat. starrum, from Heb. shetar=a deed, a contract, shatar=to write.] An ancient name for all deeds, leases, or obligations of the Jews, and also for a schedule or inventory.

star, v. t. & i. [STAR (1), s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To set or adorn with stars or bright radiating bodies; to bespangle.

"Like a sable curtain starr'd with gold."
Young: Night Thoughts, ix. 563.

2. To make a radiating crack or flaw in; as, to star a mirror. (Colloq.)

B. Intransitive:I. Ordinary Language:

1. To shine as a star; to be brilliant or prominent

2. To shine above others, as a theatrical or musical performer; to appear as an actor, &c., in the provinces among inferior players. (Theat. slang.)

B. Intransitive:

Naut.: To turn or put the helm to the right or starboard side of a vessel.

starch, *starche, s. & a. [A weakened form of stark (q. v.), as bench from A. S. benc, arch from Fr. arc, &c.; Ger. stärke=(1) strength, (2) starch, from stark=strong.]

A. As substantive:1. Literally and Technically.

(1) Chem.: (C₁₂H₂₀O₁₀)ⁿ. Amylum. Fecula. One of the most important and widely diffused substances in the vegetable kingdom, being found in greater or less quantity in almost every plant. To prepare it, the root or seed is finely ground, so as to break the cell-membranes, stirred up with water, and the milky liquid, after passing through a fine sieve, allowed to stand for some time, when the starch settles to the bottom of the vessel. It is a glittering white powder, soft to the touch, tasteless and insoluble in cold water. Specific gravity, 1.505 at 19°. Under the microscope it is found to consist of granules varying in size, according to the plant from which it is obtained, from .002 to .185 millimeter in diameter. The granule consists of a thin envelope or series of envelopes, having the composition of cellulose, and inclosing the true starch matter or grannlose. In water heated to more than 40°, the granules swell, burst the integument, and the granulose diffusing through the liquid makes the mass appear like a solution. On cooling, if too much water has not been used, it becomes a transparent or semi-transparent jelly, and dries to a hard mass. Sulphuric acid and diastase change it into dextrose, maltose, or dextrine, according to the temperature and the agent employed. Heated to 160°, starch is converted into dextrin. The most characteristic reaction for starch is the deep blue color which it gives with iodine.

(2) Bot. & Physiol.: Starch is deposited in vegetable cells. Starch grains are stored up as reserve food material in bulbs, rhizomes, tubers, the cellular parts of endogenous stems, seeds, &c. It is starch which makes the grains of cereals and the seeds of leguminous plants so nutritive.

2. Figuratively: A stiff, formal manner; formality, starchedness, primness; as, to take all the starch out of a person.

B. As adj.: Stiff, precise, starched, prim, formal.

"Phillips came forth as starch as a Quaker."

Buckinghamshire: Election of Laureat.

Ornith.: A popular name for any individual of the genus Sturnus (q. v.), sometimes extended to the whole family [STURNIDÆ], but specifically applied to Sturnus vulgaris, the Common Starling, abundant in most parts of the continent of Europe, frequently visiting northern Africa in its winter migrations. The male is about eight inches long, general color of the plumage black, glossed with blue and purple, the feathers, except those of the head and fore-neck, having a triangular white spot on the tip. The female is very similar, but has the feathers tipped with broader spots, those on the upper parts being light brown. The eggs are from four to six in number, light blue in color, and are deposited in some hole or crevice on a scanty lining. Starlings feed on snails, worms, and insects; they are gregarious, uniting in large flocks, and may be readily distinguished from all other birds by their whirling method of flight. They become exceedingly familiar in confinement, and display great imitative powers, learning to whistle tunes and to articulate words and phrases with great distinctness.

"Your skirmishing parties . . . shall never drive my statarianly disciplined battalion from its ground." — Search: Light of Nature, vol. ii., pt. ii., ch. xiii.

stā'-tar-ŷ, a. [Lat. statarius.] Fixed, settled.

"The set and statar times of paring of nails, and cutting of hair, is thought by many a point of consideration." — Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. v., ch. xxi.

stāte, *stat, s. & a. [O. Fr. estat (French état) = estate, case, nature, from Lat. statum, accusative of status = condition, from statum, superlat. of sto = to stand; Sp. & Port. estado; Ital. stato. State and estate are doublets.]

A. As substantive:

1. Condition as determined by circumstances of any kind; the condition or circumstances of any being or thing at any given time; position.

"I all alone beweepe my outcast state."

Shakesp.: Sonnet 29.

2. Rank, condition, standing, quality.

"Had he matched according to his state."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., ii. 2.

*3. A seat or chair of dignity; a throne.

"This chair shall be my state, this dagger my scepter." — Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., ii. 4.

*4. A canopy; a covering of state.

5. Royal or gorgeous pomp; splendor; appearance of greatness.

"High on a throne of royal state."

Milton: P. L., ii. 1.

*6. Dignity of deportment.

"With what great state he heard their embassy."

Shakesp.: Henry V., ii. 4.

*7. A person of high rank. (Milton: P. L., ii. 387.)

*8. Estate, possession.

"Strong was their plot,

Their states far off, and they of wary wit."

Daniel. (Todd.)

9. Any body of men constituting a community of a particular character in virtue of certain political privileges, who partake either directly or by representation in the government of their country; an estate; as, The Lords spiritual and temporal and the Commons are the states (or estates) of the realm in Great Britain.

10. (Pl.): The legislative body in the island of Jersey. It consists of fifty-five persons, including the Bailiff of the island, who is ex officio president. The Lieutenant-Governor has a power of veto, and the States may not be convened without his consent. Guernsey has an analogous body, the Deliberative States, and a more popular assembly, the Elective States. In both islands the States deal only with questions of internal administration.

"The States of Jersey on Monday passed a measure to enable landlords to evict refractory tenants." — Reynolds' Newspaper, Feb. 13, 1887.

¶ States-General: The bodies that constitute the legislature of a country, in contradistinction to the assemblies of provinces; specifically, the name given to the legislative assemblies of France before the revolution of 1789, and to those of the Netherlands.

11. A whole people united into a body politic; a civil and self-governing community. (Often with the.)

"Our state thinks not so." — Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iv. 3.

12. The power wielded by the government of a country; the civil power, often as contrasted with ecclesiastical.

"The same criminal may be absolved by the church, and condemned by the state; absolved or pardoned by the state, yet censured by the church." — Lesley.

13. One of the commonwealths or bodies politic which together go to compose a federal republic, and which stand in certain specified relations with the central or national Government, and, as regards internal affairs, are more or less independent; as, the State of Pennsylvania.

¶ The erection of the constituent members of the American Union into their present states and reciprocal relations may be said properly to have begun with the formal ratification of the first Constitution of the United States, the order of which, by states, is given below. Prior to this action on their part, the colonies had occupied simply the position of a congeries of provinces banded together for mutual defense, and having no other organic union than a common legislative body composed of delegates sent from each colony, which delegates might be withheld and all connection with the general body dissolved by the independent action of any one of the commonwealths composing it. The first to enter the sisterhood of states by ratifying the Constitution was Delaware, which, on December 7, 1787, unanimously voted its adoption; then followed Pennsylvania, December 12, 1787, vote 46 to 23; New Jersey, December 18, 1787, unanimously; Georgia, January 2, 1788, unanimously; Connecticut, January 9, 1788, vote 123 to 40; Massachusetts, February 6, 1788, vote 187 to 168; Maryland, April 28, 1788, vote 63 to 12; South Carolina, May 23, 1788, vote 149 to 73; New Hampshire, June 21, 1788, vote 57 to 46; Virginia, June, 1788, vote 89 to 79; New York, July 26, 1788, vote 30 to 28; North Carolina, November 21, 1789, vote 193 to 75; Rhode Island, May 29, 1790, vote 34 to 32. It will thus be seen that Delaware is really the oldest state in the Union while Rhode Island is the youngest. After the ratification of the Constitution and the entrance into statehood by the thirteen original parties to the contract, the other members of the Union were admitted by act of Congress, upon their own petition and authority in the following order:

Utah has become the forty-fifth state. The constitution was set for ratification at the November election in 1895. After the conclusion of the civil war, for a time the seceding states were deprived of statehood, and were subjected to military or territorial rule. Gradually, however, a reconstruction of the organic government of the states was accomplished, and they were readmitted into full fellowship in the galaxy of states. The government of each state is an autonomy, and each is the supreme judge of its own laws, except so far as affected by the laws and Constitution of the United States, the superior power of which is granted expressly in the compact of union. The chief executive is a governor elected by the people for terms of varying length. The legislative body is composed of two houses, an upper and lower, also elected by the people; while the judiciary is selected by varying methods, in some states being elected directly by the people, in others by the legislature, and in still others appointed (in some instances) by the governor. Each state has in the national congress two senators and a number of representatives in the lower house based on the population of the state. The following table shows the basis of representation at different periods, and also the number of representatives to which each state is entitled. In presidential elections each state is entitled to select as many presidential electors as it has national representatives and senators combined. This table thus shows at a glance the representation and electoral vote of each state:

Bot.: A tribe of Plumbaginaceæ having the styles free.

stāt'-ics, s. [STATIC.]

Physics: That branch of dynamics which investigates the relations which exist between forces in equilibrium. A body is said to be in equilibrium when, if two or more forces act upon it at the same time, their united effect is such that no motion ensues. The science of dynamics is divided into kinetics and statics, the former treating of forces considered as producing motion, the latter of forces considered as producing rest. By some authorities statics is used in opposition to dynamics, the former being the science of equilibrium or rest, the latter of motion, and the two together constituting mechanics. The two great propositions in statics are that of the lever and that of the composition of forces.

"John Wallis placed the whole system of statics on a new foundation."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

¶ Social statics: [SOCIOLOGY.]

†stāt'-i-grāph, †stāt'-i-grām, subst. [Eng. statics]; suff. -graph, -gram.] Terms proposed to denote representations of statistics by means of lines, areas, &c. (Nature, Oct. 22, 1885, p. 597.)

stā'-tion, sta-ci-on, s. [Fr. station, from Lat. stationem, accus. of statio=a standing still, from status, pa. par. of sto=to stand; Sp. estacion; Ital. stazione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. The act or manner of standing; attitude, posture, pose.

"In station like the herald Mercury."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 4.

*2. A state or condition of standing or rest; a standing.

"His motion and her station are as one."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 3.

3. The spot or place where a person or thing stands, especially the spot or place where a person habitually stands or is posted to remain for a time; a post assigned.

"Take up some other station."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iv. 5.

*4. Situation, position.

"The fig and date, why love they to remain
In middle station, and an even plain?"

Prior: Solomon, i. 68.

5. Condition of life; social position; rank, state, status.

"And yet my love without ambition grew,
I knew thy state, my station."

Byron: Lament of Tasso, v.

6. Employment, occupation, business; sphere or department of duty.

"We acquire new strength and resolution to perform God's will in our several stations the week following."—Nelson. (Todd.)

II. Technically:

1. Ecclesiology and Church History:

(1) A name given to the fast on Wednesdays and Fridays. In the Roman Church these were fasts of devotion, not of precept, and the Wednesday fast died out, while that on Friday became obligatory, about the end of the ninth century.

(2) A church in which a procession of the clergy halts on stated days to say any stated prayers.

(3) A stopping-place in a monastic procession. These are usually three: Before, (a) the dormitory; (b) the refectory, and (c) the west door of the church.

(4) Any one of the series of stopping-places in the devotion of the Stations of the Cross.

(5) (In Ireland); (See extract).

"A station in this sense differs from a station made to any peculiar spot remarkable for local sanctity . . . here, it simply means the coming of the parish priest and his curate to some house in the townland, on a day publicly announced from the altar for that purpose, on the preceding Sabbath. This is done to give those who live within the district in which the station is held an opportunity of coming to their duty, as frequenting the ordinance of confession is emphatically called."—Carleton: Tales of Irish Peasantry; The Station.

2. Police: A place or building where the police force of any district has its headquarters; a district or branch police-office.

3. Railway: A building or buildings erected for the reception and accommodation of passengers and freight intended to be conveyed by railway; a place at which railway trains regularly stop for the setting down or taking up of passengers or freight. [DEPOT.]

4. Shipbuild.: A room-and-space staff (q. v.).

5. Survey.: The position of an instrument at the time of an observation.

6. Zoölogy and Botany:

(1) The peculiar nature of the locality where any plant grows or any animal lives. In the case of plants, it has reference to climate, soil, humidity, light, and elevation above the sea; in that of animals, it has reference chiefly to food, climate, and elevation. Thus some animals feed only on certain plants, and cannot exist where they are absent. The station differs from the habitation or habitat of the plant or animal, which simply means the country of which it is a native. (Lyell: Princ. of Geol., ch. xxxviii., xlii.)

(2) A building, generally on the sea-coast, fitted with all appliances for the examination of the animals of the adjacent bay, gulf, &c.; as, the Granton station, the Neapolitan station, &c.

¶ (1) Military station: A place where troops are regularly kept in garrison.

(2) Naval station: A safe and commodious shelter or harbor for the navy or mercantile marine of a nation, provided with a dock and all other requisites for the repair of ships.

(3) Stations of the Cross:

Eccles. & Church Hist.: A popular devotion in the Roman Church, consisting of visits, either alone or in procession, to a series of pictures or images, each corresponding to some particular stage in the Passion of Christ, and meditating devoutly thereon. The stations are to be found in nearly every church, and on the continent of Europe they are frequently erected in the open air. The devotion began in the Franciscan order, the official guardians of the Holy Places of the Latins in Jerusalem, and is intended to be a pilgrimage in spirit to the scene of the Savior's sufferings and death. Many indulgences are annexed to the Stations of the Cross. When the stations are made in procession, a verse of the Stabat Mater (q. v.) is sung as the people pass from one station to another. Called also, Way of the Cross. There are fourteen stations:

1. Christ condemned by Pilate; 2. Christ receives His cross; 3. His first fall; 4. His meeting with His mother; 5. The bearing of the cross by Simon of Cyrene; 6. Veronica wipes the face of Jesus with a handkerchief; 7. His second fall; 8. His words to the women of Jerusalem: "Weep not for Me," &c.; 9. His third fall; 10. He is stripped of His garments; 11. The crucifixion; 12. The death of Jesus; 13. The taking down from the cross; 14. The burial.

Naut.: A list containing the appointed posts of the ship's company when navigating the ship.

1. A dial-board at a railway-station, to indicate the hours of starting of trains for given destinations, or the time of starting of the next train for a given place.

2. A contrivance by which the name of the station they are approaching is exposed to the view of passengers in a railway-carriage.

station-clerk, s. A clerk employed at a railway-station.

station-house, s. A police-station.

station-master, s. The official in charge of a station; specif., the official in charge of a railway-station.

station-pointer, s. A circular plotting instrument, having a standard radius and two movable ones. By laying off two observed angles right and left from a central object, and laying it over the objects on a chart, the position of the observer is indicated.

Survey.: An instrument for taking angles.

stā'-tion, v. t. [STATION, s.] To place, set, or post in or at a certain station; to assign a station, post, or position to; to appoint to the occupation of a post, place, or office.

"This youth had station'd many a warlike band Of horse and foot."

Hoole: Orlando Furioso, xxiii.

stā'-tion-āl, a. [Eng. station, s.; -al.] Of or pertaining to a station.

stā'-tion-ar-i-nēss, subst. [Eng. stationary; -ness.] The quality or state of being stationary; fixity.

stā'-tion-ar-ŷ, a. & s. [Fr. stationnaire, from Lat. stationarius, from statio=a station (q. v.); Sp. estacionario; Ital. stazionario.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Remaining or continuing in the same station or place; not moving, or not appearing to move; fixed, stable.

"No stationary steeds Congh their own knell." Cowper: Task, iv. 147.

2. Remaining in the same condition or state; neither progressing nor receding; neither improving nor getting worse; standing still.

"Though the wealth of a country should be very great, yet if it has been long stationary, we must not expect to find the wages of labor very high in it."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. i., ch. viii.

II. Astron. (of a planet): Not changing its relative place in the heavens for some days. This stage occurs at the beginning and ending of the planet's retrogradation.

B. As subst.: A person or thing which remains or continues in the same place.

"Then they are stationaries in their houses, which be in the middle points of the latitudes, which they call eclipses."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. ii., ch. xvi.

stationary-diseases, s. pl.

Pathol.: Certain diseases which depend upon a particular state of the atmosphere, and which, after prevailing for a certain number of years, give way to others. (Dunghlison.)

A. As adjective*: Determined, decreed, ordained, settled.

"It is statute and ordaint, that gif ony ship, galzeoun, or other vessel, happonis to brek."—Sea Lawis in Bal-four's Practics, p. 623.

B. As substantive:

1. A law proceeding from the government of a state; an enactment of the legislature of a state; a written law.

"The written laws of the kingdom are statutes, acts, or edicts, made by the sovereign, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled. The oldest of these now extant, and printed in our statute books, is the famous Magna Charta, as confirmed in parliament 9 Henry III. . . . And these statutes are either general or special, public or private. A general or public act is a universal rule, that regards the whole community; and of this the courts of law are bound to take notice judicially and ex officio. Special or private acts are rather exceptions than rules, being those which only operate upon particular persons, and private concerns; and of these the judges are not bound to take notice, unless they be formally shown and pleaded. Statutes also are said to be either declaratory or remedial. Declaratory, where the old custom of the kingdom is fallen into disuse, or becomes disputable; in which case parliament has sometimes thought proper to declare what the common law is and ever has been. . . . Remedial statutes are those which are made to supply defects in the common law itself, either by enlarging the law where it was narrow, or by restraining it where it was too lax."—Blackstone: Comment., §2. (Introd.)

2. The act of a corporation, or of its founder intended as a permanent rule or law; as, the statute of a university.

3. (In foreign and civil law): Any particular municipal law or usage, though not resting for its authority on judicial decisions or the practice of nations. (Burrill.)

Mineralogy:

1. An orthorhombic mineral occurring only in crystals, mostly in cruciform twins of two kinds, one in which the crystals form approximately right angles with each other, and the other in which they are inclined at an angle of about 60°. Hardness 7 to 7.5; specific gravity, 3.4 to 3.8, after purifying, 3.70 to 3.76; luster, sub-vitreous; color, dark brown to black, sometimes grayish; translucent to opaque; fracture, conchoidal. Composition: Silica, 28.3; alumina, 51.7; protoxide of iron, 15.8; magnesia, 2.5; water, 1.7=100, the discrepancies in the analyses being due to impurities. The varieties are: (1) Ordinary; (2) Zinc-staurolite; (3) Manganese-staurolite=Nordmarkite. Occurs in the schists and gneiss, occasionally in crystals of a tessellated structure, when seen in transverse section, resembling chialolite.

2. The same as HARMOTOME (q. v.). Named by Kirwan because of its cruciform twins.

staurolite-schist, s.

Petrol.: A fine micaceous schist containing crystals of staurolite in various stages of development.

stâu-rô-pūs, s. [Pref. stauro-, and Gr. pous=a foot.]

Entom.: A genus of Notodontidæ. [LOBSTER-MOTH.]

stâu-rô-scôpe, s. [Pref. stauro-, and Gr. skopeō=to see.]

Optics: A kind of polariscope invented by Von Kobell, of Bavaria, about 1855, and particularly designed for investigating the effects of polarized light upon crystals.

(2) Any rod in a steam-boiler which connects parts exposed to rupture in contrary directions.

(3) A tension-rod in the frame of the marine steam-engine.

2. Build.: Any tie-rod which prevents the spreading asunder of the parts connected.

stay-wedge, s.

Locomotive: One of the wedges fitted to the inside bearings of the driving-axles, to keep them in their proper position in the stays.

stay (2), s. [A. S. stæg; cogn. with Dut. stag; Icel. stæg, Dan., Ger., & Sw. stag; prob. from its being used to climb by; cf. A. S. stæger=a stair; Sw. stega=a ladder.]

Naut.: A strong rope which stiffens and supports a mast in its erect position, by connecting its head to some part of the hull, or to a part stayed from the hull. The fore-and-aft stays lead forward in the vessel's line amidships; the back stays pass somewhat abaft the shrouds, and are attached to the side of the vessel, at the channels; the breast and standing stays lead from the mast-heads down to the gunwale on each side. Spring stays are preventer stays to assist the principal ones. The fore-and-aft stays support the staysails by means of hanks. The stays are named from the masts they support; as, the forestay, foretopmast-stay, main-topmast-stay, jib and flying-jib stay, bob-stay, &c. A jumper-stay is a movable stay leading from the head of a mainmast to a pair of eye-bolts in the deck close to the after part of the fore-rigging. The triatic stay is connected at its ends to the heads of the fore and main masts, and has a thimble spliced to its bight for the suspension of the stay-tackle (q. v.).

"When the Manila ship first puts to sea, she takes on board a much greater quantity of water than can be stowed between decks, and the jars which contain it are hung all about the shrouds and stays, so as to exhibit at a distance a very odd appearance."—Anson: Voyages, bk. ii., ch. x.

¶ 1. In stays, hove in stays:

Naut.: The situation of a vessel when she is staying or going about from one tack to another. For details see illustration.

2. To miss stays:

To fail in tacking.

3. To heave in stays:

To put a vessel about by tacking.

4. Slack in stays:

The situation of a ship when she works slowly in stays.

stay-hole, s.

Naut.: The grommet or hole in a stay-sail through which the hanks pass; by the latter the sail runs on the stay.

stay-sail, s.

Naut.: A fore-and-aft sail supported by a stay of a vessel.

"If caught suddenly in a squall, the stay-sail can be quickly lowered."—Field, Jan. 30, 1886.

stay-tackle, s.

Naut.: Tackle suspended from the triatic stay, and used for hoisting in heavy butts of water, freight, boats, blubber, &c.

*stāyd, *stāyed, a. [STAY (1), v.] Staid (q. v.).

Moves like a ghost." Shakesp.: Macbeth, ii. 1.

stēam, steēm, stem, steeme, s. [A. S. stēam=a vapor, smell, smoke; Dut. stoom=steam.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 1.

2. Popularly applied to the visible moist vapor which rises from water, and from all moist and liquid bodies, when subjected to the action of heat; as, the steam of boiling water.

3. Haze caused by the sun's heat.

4. Any exhalation.

"A pestilent and most corrosive steam,

Like a gross fog Boeotian, rising fast."

Cowper: Task, iii. 494.

II. Technically:

1. Physics: Water in its gaseous form. It is a colorless, invisible gas, quite distinct from the visible cloud which issues from a kettle, &c., which is composed of minute drops of water produced by the condensation of the steam as it issues into the colder air. Under ordinary atmospheric pressure, water boils in an open vessel at a temperature of 212°, and the steam always has this temperature, no matter how fast the water is made to boil. The heat which is supplied simply suffices to do the work of converting the liquid water at 212° into gaseous steam at 212°, without raising the temperature of the steam at all. If the temperature of steam at 212° is lowered by only a very small amount, part of the steam is condensed; hence steam at this temperature is termed moist or saturated steam. At high temperatures and pressures, steam behaves like a perfect gas; but at lower pressures and at temperatures near the boiling-point of water, its behavior differs markedly from that of perfect gases; and this change of properties has to be taken into account in all calculations connected with the expansion of steam in steam-engines. [LAW, ¶ (2).] The terms high pressure (q. v.) and low pressure (q. v.) are applied to steam without any sharply-defined limit between them. If the steam is superheated by passing it through hot pipes, it is converted into dry steam, which, within certain limits, behaves like a perfect gas. If, instead of allowing the steam to escape freely, the water is boiled in a closed vessel, the steam accumulates, and both pressure and temperature rapidly increase, until the former becomes several times greater than that of the atmosphere. If now the steam is allowed to escape, it rapidly expands, and if it escapes into the cylinder of a steam-engine (q. v.), the expansion can be utilized and converted into work. As the steam expands, its pressure of course becomes less and less, until it is not greater than that of the atmosphere; and at the same time its temperature is reduced, the reduction depending on the rapidity with which expansion takes place. The economic uses of steam are extremely numerous. The most important is that of an agent for the production of mechanical force on railways, in steam-boats, and in manufactories. It is also largely employed in warming buildings, in heating baths, in hewing, in distilling, and for cooking purposes. [STEAM-ENGINE.]

2. Geol.: The explosive force of steam seeking vent is believed to be a potent factor in producing earthquakes and volcanic phenomena.

steam-blower, s. A blower driven by a steam-engine, or one in which the steam is mingled with the air-hlast. [BLOWER, s., II. 1.]

steam-boat, s. A boat or vessel propelled by steam acting either on paddles or on a screw. The term especially belongs to steam river-craft; ocean-going craft being called steamers, steamships, &c.

¶ Genesis of the steam-boat: The first steam-boat was built by Dennis Papin, who navigated it safely down the Fulda as long ago as 1707. Unfortunately this pioneer craft was destroyed by jealous sailors, and even the very memory of it was lost for three-quarters of a century. In 1775 Perrier, another Frenchman, built an experimental steam vessel at Paris. Eight years later, in 1783, Jouffroy took up the idea that had been evolved by Papin and Perrier and built a steam-boat which did good service for some time on the Saone.

The first American to attempt to apply steam to navigation was John Fitch, a Connecticut mechanic, who made his initial experiments in the year 1785. To what extent Fitch was indebted to the three illustrious French inventors named above we are not informed, but that his models were original there is not the least doubt. In the first he employed a large pipe kettle for generating the steam, the motive power being side paddles working after the fashion of oars on a common rowboat. In the second Fitch craft the same mode of propulsion was adopted with the exception that the paddles were made to imitate a revolving wheel and were fixed to the stern—clearly foreshadowing the present sternwheeler.

This last mentioned boat was the first American steam vessel that can be pronounced a success. It made its first trip to Burlington in July, 1788. But, after all, it was not until after the opening of the present century that steam navigation started into actual life. In 1807 Robert Fulton (who every school child knows was an American), in conjunction with one Robert R. Livingston, built the Clermont and established a regular packet service between New York and Albany.

The success of this undertaking was so satisfactory that four new boats were built before the end of 1811, at least two of them being designed for service in other rivers. [STEAMSHIP.]

Steam-boat rollers: Rollers armed with steel teeth, and revolving on parallel axes toward each other, by which coal is broken at the mines. The coal falls on to an inclined screen known as the steam-boat screen (q. v.).

Steam-boat screen: An inclined barrel-screen which receives the coal from the steam-boat rollers, and sorts it.

steam-boiler, s. [STEAM-ENGINE.]

steam-box, s. A steam-chest.

steam-brake, s.

Rail. Eng.: A device for bringing the power of steam under pressure to act upon the carriage wheels and stop their motion.

steam-buzzer, subst. A form of steam-whistle (q. v.) used in manufacturing districts as a signal for commencing and leaving off work. (Eng.)

"Nothing at all approaching the steam-buzzer, which is still to be found in some manufacturing neighborhoods, was known to our happy forefathers. The steam-buzzer is a peculiarly ingenious combination of the fog-horn, a threshing-machine, and a locomotive boiler on the point of bursting. When this device 'goes off' at six o'clock in the morning, with the object of summoning workpeople to their daily toil, it is universally recognized in its vicinity that the time for sleep has passed."—London Daily Telegraph.

steam-car, s. A steam-carriage; a car or carriage drawn by steam power.

steam-carriage, subst. A carriage propelled by steam; specially used of a locomotive engine adapted to work on an ordinary road. [STEAM-ENGINE, TRAMWAY.]

steam-casing, s.

Steam-eng.: A steam-jacket around a cylinder or other object to keep in the warmth. Invented by Watt, to prevent the radiation of heat from the cylinder.

steam-chamber, s.

1. The steam-room in a boiler; the space for the collection of steam, above the water-line; a steam-dome.

2. A steam-tank (q. v.).

steam-chest, s.

1. Steam-engine: A box or chamber above the boiler to form a reservoir for the steam, and whence it passes to the engine.

2. Calico-printing: One form of steam apparatus in which steam is applied to cloths, in order to fix the colors, called steam-colors from this mode of treatment.

3. A chamber heated by steam, and used for softening timber which is to be bent to a curved form, as ships' planking.

steam-chimney, s.

Steam-engine: An annular chamber around the chimney of a boiler-furnace for superheating steam.

steam-cock, s. A valve or faucet in a steam-pipe.

steam-coil, s. A steam-pipe bent into a shape to occupy the bottom or sides of a boiler, so as to have a large surface in compact space. Used in lard-tanks, malt-vats, vacuum-pans, &c.

steam-colors, s. pl. A style of calico-printing in which a mixture of dye extracts and mordants is typically applied to cloth, while the chemical reaction which fixes the colors to the fiber is produced by steam.

steam-crane, subst. A crane worked by a steam-engine; it frequently carries the engine upon the same frame.

steam-cylinder, s.

Steam-eng.: The chamber within which the piston reciprocates. [PISTON.]

steam-dome, s. [STEAM-CHAMBER, 1.]

steam-engine, s.

Steam & Mech.: An apparatus for converting heat into work. The first steam-engine of which we have any account is the eolipile (q. v.). The Marquis of Worcester (about 1601-1667) described a steam-engine in his Century of Inventions, but no practical result followed. In 1698 Captain Savery described his engine for raising water, and this was the first actually used. The principle had been described by Papin a few years previously [DIGESTER, II.], and was applied by Newcomen, who, in conjunction with Cawley, invented the first self-acting engine in 1712, and used it for working pumps, &c. It consisted of a cylinder in which there was a circular disc or piston fitting tightly, but capable of being moved up and down. Attached to the center of the piston was a vertical shaft or piston-rod; and a stout beam, turning about a center, was attached at one end by a chain to the piston-rod, and at the other end by a chain to a pump-rod. Steam was admitted to the cylinder at the bottom, and the piston rose, the pump-rod being pulled down by a counterpoise attached to that end of the beam. When the cylinder was full of steam, the supply was cut off, and cold water was injected into the cylinder. The steam was thus condensed, and the pressure of the atmosphere acting on the top of the piston drove it down, raising the opposite end of the beam, and with it the pump-rod. In 1763 James Watt invented the method of condensing the steam in a separate vessel away from the cylinder [CONDENSER, II., 1]; he also was the first to use the pressure of the steam itself instead of that of the atmosphere, thus making the mechanism in reality a steam-engine. Watt's first patent was taken out in 1769. Newcomen's engine and Watt's first engine were single-acting (q. v.). In 1781 Watt took out a patent for a double-acting steam-engine (q. v.). Sometime previously to this Watt had introduced the method of allowing the steam to work expansively. [EXPANSION, II. 5], and showed that the condenser might be dispensed with, the waste steam being discharged into the air by opening suitable valves. The non-condensation of the steam and the method of working steam expansively can only be satisfactorily employed with high-pressure engines, in which the pressure of the steam is several times greater than that of the atmosphere; the early engines of Newcomen and Watt were low-pressure engines, in which the pressure of the steam was not very much greater than that of the atmosphere. The essential parts of a modern steam-engine are: The steam-boiler, usually called the boiler, in which the steam is generated. It is made of wrought-iron plates, sufficiently thick to resist considerably more than the highest pressure which they will be called upon to bear, and the form of the boiler is designed to secure the greatest possible economy of heat. The boilers of locomotives, and of those of many stationary engines, are traversed by a large number of tubes, along which the gases from the fire pass; and in steam fire-engines the boiler consists of a series of comparatively narrow tubes filled with water, this being the form which enables steam to be got up with the greatest rapidity. The height of the water and the pressure of steam in the boiler are indicated by gauges, of which there are several forms. In order to prevent the pressure rising too high, each boiler is fitted with one or more forms of safety-valve (q. v.). The cylinder is made of cast-iron, carefully bored on the inside; and the piston (q. v.) is a circular plate of iron packed closely into the cylinder by means of metallic rings. The piston-rod is usually steel, and passes out of the cylinder through a stuffing-box, in which it is packed steam-tight, either by greased tow or by metallic-rings. The cylinder is provided with a steam-jacket, or outer casing, in which steam circulates; or is covered with some non-conducting material, in order to prevent loss of heat and consequent condensation of steam. The distribution of steam, or its admission above and below the piston, is controlled by a slide-valve (q. v.), working in a small cylinder or valve-casing attached to the cylinder. According to the arrangement of these principal parts, distinctive names are applied to steam-engines. [BEAM-ENGINE, HORIZONTAL STEAM-ENGINE, OSCILLATING-ENGINE, VERTICAL-ENGINE.] They are also classified according to their uses, as Portable, Stationary, Locomotive, Marine, Pumping, &c. In order to overcome the difficulty of the dead-points (q. v.), the fly-wheel was adopted by Watt in his engines, and has been used ever since. [FLY-WHEEL.] In engines which have no fly-wheel the same end is attained by having two cylinders, working on the same shaft, but with their cranks at right angles. The speed at which an engine works depends on the resistance which it has to overcome; and where this resistance is continually varying, as it generally is, the speed of the engine will also vary. It is necessary, however, to keep the speed as uniform as possible, and this is done partly by the fly-wheel, and partly by the governor. [GOVERNOR, II., 2.] In locomotive and other engines where fly-wheels or governors are not used, the speed is regulated by means of an arrangement for varying the time at which the steam is cut off by the slide-valve. [COMPOUND STEAM-ENGINE.] About 1784, Watt patented, but did not actually construct, a locomotive, and Murdoch made a small high-pressure engine, the fly-wheels of which, nine and a half inches in diameter, were used as driving-wheels. Trevithick constructed a high-pressure locomotive in 1802, and Blenkinsop and Chapman also made locomotives a few years later. The oldest locomotive in existence, Puffing Billy, now in the Patent Museum, South Kensington, was constructed in 1813, and was continually used until June 6, 1862. In 1814, Stephenson constructed the Killingworth Engine, which he continually improved, and, in 1829, won the prize offered by the directors of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, with his engine, Rocket. In this he used two cylinders placed one on each side of the engine, and acting on cranks attached to large driving-wheels. The boiler was traversed by a number of narrow tubes, as proposed by Seguin and Booth. In modern locomotives, the boilers are of the tubular form, and the engine is driven by two, or occasionally four, cylinders, which in England are placed in front under, but in this country at the sides of the boiler. The waste steam from the cylinders is discharged through a pipe in the chimney of the engine, and creates the draught for the boiler. The two cylinders act on cranks on the axle of the driving-wheels, which are sometimes eight or nine feet in diameter. The number of wheels is six, eight, and in some cases twelve, there being two, four, or six driving-wheels coupled together. The engine can be controlled, stopped, and reversed by a link arrangement (invented by Stephenson), which acts on the slide-valves. The weight of a locomotive is not unfrequently more than sixty tons, and the speed attained is more than seventy miles an hour on a slight down incline. The work which an engine can do is usually estimated in horse-power (q. v.), but the value of this unit varies. The nominal or low-pressure horse-power of English marine engines is not 33,000 foot pounds, as on land, but more than 44,000 foot pounds, and in this country its value is still greater. The efficiency of an engine is generally determined by an apparatus in which the pressure of the steam and the motion of the engine are made to trace a curve on paper by a suitable arrangement of mechanism. [INDICATOR, II., 3.]

steam fire-engine, s. [FIRE-ENGINE, 1.]

steam-fountain, s. A jet or body of water raised by the pressure of steam upon the surface of the water in a reservoir.

steam-gas, s. [SUPERHEATED STEAM (q. v.).]

steam-gauge, s. An instrument attached to a boiler to indicate the pressure of steam. There are many varieties. The oldest and simplest consists of a bent tube partially filled with mercury, one end of which springs from the boiler, so that the steam rising in the tube forces up the mercury in proportion to the amount of pressure. Bourdon's consists of an elliptical copper tube bent into an arc of 540°. One of the extremities communicates with the boiler or reservoir of condensed gas whose pressure is to be measured, and the other carries an index which moves backward or forward on a graduated arc as the curvature of the tube is varied by changes of pressure.

steam-governor, s. [GOVERNOR.]

steam-gun, s. A gun whose projectile force is derived from the expansion of steam issuing through a shotted tube.

steam-hammer, s.

Mech.: A hammer worked by means of steam. The idea of a steam-hammer seems to have occurred first to James Watt, who patented it in 1784. William Deverell also took out a patent for a steam-hammer in 1806; but it does not appear that in either case the idea was carried into operation. In 1839 James Nasmyth invented the steam-hammer called after him, and patented it in 1842. In the older forms of steam-hammer, the hammer-head, attached to one end of a lever, was raised by the action of a cog-wheel or cam acting on the other end of the lever, and was then allowed to fall by its own weight. Hammers of this description are often called Steam-tilts. In Nasmyth's hammer, the head is attached to the piston-rod of an inverted cylinder supported vertically, and the piston is raised by the action of the steam admitted into the cylinder below the piston. The hammer is allowed to fall by its own weight, or is driven downward with still greater velocity by the action of steam admitted into the cylinder above the piston. The admission of steam into the cylinder is regulated by a slide-valve worked by a lever, and the force of the stroke can be controlled to such an extent by regulating the admission of steam, that the largest hammer can be made to crack a nut, or to come down upon a mass of iron with a momentum of many hundred foot-tons. The cylinder, which is supported on a strong iron framework, is very strong, and the steam-pipes are of extra strength, because of the high pressure at which the steam is employed. The piston-rod is of stout wrought-iron or steel, and the hammer itself is also of steel. The weight of the hammer ranges from about two hundred-weight to twenty-five tons; and the object to be struck is placed upon an anvil, consisting of a slab of iron, resting on a huge mass of piles and concrete, which frequently descends a great depth into the ground. There are some other forms of less importance. In Condie's steam-hammer the hammer-head is attached to the lower end of the cylinder, and Ramsbottom's two cylinders move horizontally in the same line, but in different directions, and the metal to be forged is placed between them. Steam-hammers are rated or classified according to the effective weight of the piston and hammer-head or drop, and range from 100 pounds up to many tons.

steam-hoist, s. An elevator or lift worked by a steam-engine, frequently portable.

steam-horn, s. A steam-buzzer (q. v.).

"The steam-horns of large manufactories."—Notes and Queries, April 2, 1887, p. 279.

steam-indicator, subst. A device to record the pressure of steam. It was invented by James Watt.

steam-jacket, s. [JACKET, s. II. 1.]

bôll, bôÿ; pôut, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tjon, -sion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

steam-jet, s. A blast of steam emitted from a nozzle.

Steam-jet pump: A form of injector or ejector in which the body of water is put in motion by a steam-jet.

steam-kitchen, s. An apparatus for cooking by steam.

steam-launch, s. A large kind of boat with a propeller-engine.

steam-navigation, s. The art or practice of applying steam to the propelling of boats and vessels; the art or practice of navigating steam vessels. A doubtful claim has been made that on June 17, 1543, a Spaniard, Blasco de Garay, exhibited a steam-ship, which made an experimental trip in the port of Barcelona, in presence of commissioners appointed by Charles V. The Marquis of Worcester described a steam-ship in 1655, though he did not publish his description till 1663. On Dec. 21, 1736, a patent was granted to Jonathan Hulls for a kind of steam-tug, which he does not seem actually to have constructed. In 1783, Fitch, an American, moved a boat on the Delaware by paddles worked by a steam-engine; and in the same year Claude, Comte de Jouffroy, constructed an engine which propelled a boat on the Saône. Paddle wheels had been patented by Miller in 1781, and for some time all steam-boats were propelled by paddles. [SCREW-PROPELLER.] Symington used a steam-boat on the Forth and Clyde in 1790, and in 1802 he had one on the Clyde which was able to tow vessels. Fulton used a steam-boat on the Seine in 1803; and in 1807 his boat, the Clermont, with engines built by Boulton and Watt, ran from New York to Albany, and soon afterward there was a regular service between these towns. The first successful steam-boat in Europe was Bell's Comet, which in 1812 ran on the Clyde between Glasgow and Greenock, three times a week, with a maximum speed of five miles an hour. The first voyage of a steam-ship from New York to Liverpool was made by the Savannah in twenty-six days, in 1819. The first steam voyage to India was made by Captain Johnson, in the Enterprise, in 1825. Regular steam communication with America was begun in 1838; in 1845 the Great Britain did the distance from New York in fourteen days, about double the time now taken by fast liners. Marine engines are constructed on the same principle as land engines, differing mainly in their great size and power. Oscillating engines, beam engines with the beams below the cylinders, and engines in which the motion is communicated to the cranks by connecting rods, are all employed. Since water is plentiful, even high-pressure engines are worked at sea with condensers. Compound engines are also used to a considerable extent. [STEAM-SHIP.]

steam-navvy, s. A steam-engine employed in excavating earth for docks, canals, &c. (Eng.)

steam-packet, s. A steam-vessel carrying mails and running periodically between certain ports.

steam-pipe, s. Any pipe conveying steam from a boiler to an engine, or a supply-pipe in a system of steam heating or drying.

steam-plow, s. A plow or gang of plows drawn by portable steam-engines. By the same means, cultivators, harrows, and other agricultural implements are drawn.

steam-port, s.

Steam-eng.: An opening through the valve-seat to the inside of the cylinder. Known as the induction (inlet) port, or the eduction (outlet) port, respectively, according to the course of the steam.

steam-power, s. The power of steam applied to move machinery or produce any results.

steam-press, s. A press worked by steam-power; specif., a platten-machine driven by steam-power.

steam-propeller, s. The same as SCREW-PROPELLER (q. v.).

steam-ram, s. [RAM, s., II. 2. (2).]

steam-roller, s. A locomotive with wide wheels used in crushing road-metal and leveling roads.

steam-room, s. The capacity for steam over the surface of the water in the boiler.

steam-ship, s. A ship propelled by steam; a steamer.

¶ Development of the steam-ship: Fifty years ago a voyage of thirteen days in crossing the Atlantic was considered a remarkable performance. The list given below is a complete record of the ocean "greyhounds" since the Great Western in 1839 to the Lucania in 1894.

In January, 1900, the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse made the trip from New York to Cherbourg in 5 days and 16 hours, breaking all records. The first steamship that ever crossed the Atlantic was the Savannah, in 1818. The largest steamship afloat is the Celtic, which is 20 feet longer than was the famous Great Eastern, which was 680 feet long by 83 feet wide. The greatest power indicated by single-screw engine has been on the Etruria, 14,500. The highest average speed attained by a side wheeler was 14 knots, by the Scotia. The highest speed thus far attained by a twin-screw passenger steamer has been made by the Deutschland, 24.19 knots per hour. This record has been exceeded only by the U. S. Cruisers Columbia and Minneapolis, the latter of which attained a speed of 25½ miles on her deep sea trial, and ran as steady as a clock. The steamers Paris, New York, Tentonic, and Majestic were the first vessels built for the Atlantic service with triple-expansion engines and twin screws. The Campania and Lucania are respectively the fifteenth and sixteenth twin-screw vessels of more than 6,000 tons. The Servia was the first mail steamer in the New York trade to be built of steel. From March, 1841, to February, 1893, 125 steamers in the Atlantic service were lost, and 7,523 lives were lost during the same period. [STEAM-BOAT, STEAM NAVIGATION.]

steam-sled, s. A locomotive constructed to run on ice. The front part rests on a sledge, and the driving wheels are studded with spikes.

steam-stoker, s. A gas-retort charger (q. v.). [Eng.]

steam-table, s. A hollow table, heated by steam, to keep joints and other viands warm in the dining or carving rooms of hotels.

steam-tank, s. A chamber heated by steam, used for various purposes in the arts.

steam-tight, a. Tight enough to resist the ingress or egress of steam.

steam-tilt, s. A steam-hammer (q. v.).

steam-toe, s.

Steam-eng.: An arm fastened to a lifting-rod to raise it by the contact of the can or tappet. The toes on the lifting-rods of the inlet and exhaust are steam and exhaust toes respectively.

steam-trap, s. A self-acting device for the discharge of condensed water from steam-engines or steam-pipes.

steam-tug, s. A small but powerful steam-vessel for towing ships in or out of harbor.

steam vacuum-pump, s. A pump for raising water by the condensation of steam in a vessel situated at such elevation above the water supply that the atmospheric pressure will raise the water to the chamber and operate the valves.

steam-valve, s. A device for opening or closing a steam pipe or port.

steam-vessel, s. A steam-ship.

steam-way, subst. A passage leading from the steam-port of a valve to the cylinder.

steam-wheel, s. The same as ROTARY STEAM-ENGINE (q. v.).

steam-whistle, s. A sounding device connected with the boiler of a steam-engine, either stationary, locomotive, or marine, for the purpose of announcing the hours of work, signaling, &c. In the ordinary locomotive steam-whistle the foot is bolted onto the fire-box, has an opening (a) for the admission of steam, and is provided with a cock (e), by turning which steam is permitted to rush into the hollow piece (b), which is provided with holes around its lower and narrower portion, through which the steam rushes into the cavity of the cup (c), and, passing out through the narrow annular opening, impinges against the rim of the bell (d), causing a shrill, piercing sound. Holes in the top of the bell permit the escape of the steam upwardly and increase the volume of sound.

Steam-whistle.

The quality of the tone depends on the width of the annular opening, the depth of the bell, and the distance between it and the cup. The calliope (q. v.) is a series of such whistles tuned to a scale and operated by keys.

steam-winch, s. A form of hoisting-apparatus in which rotary motion is imparted to the winding-axle from the piston-rod of a steam-engine, directly or intermediately, through bevel-gearing. The former is more rapid; the latter affords greater power. Specially used for loading and unloading ships.

steam-yacht, s. A yacht fitted with a screw propeller.

stēam, *steme, *steeme, v. i. & t. [STEAM, s.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To emit steam or vapor; to give out any vapor or exhalation.

"Ye mists and exhalations that now rise
From hill or steaming lake."

Milton: P. L., v. 183.

2. To rise in a vaporous form; to pass off in visible vapor.

"The fume or vapor thereof steeming."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxix., ch. iv.

3. To move or travel by the agency of steam.

"He steamed into the station at the usual speed."—London Daily Chronicle.

B. Transitive:

*1. To emit or give up in vapor; to exhale, to evaporate.

"In slouthful sleepe his molten heart to steme."
Spenser: F. Q., II. vi. 27.

2. To expose to the action of steam, for the purpose of softening (as wood), cooking, or disinfecting.

stēam'-ēr, s. [Eng. steam, v.; -er.]

1. A vessel propelled by steam; a steam-ship.

2. A steam fire-engine.

3. A locomotive for roads.

4. A culinary vessel with a perforated bottom, placed upon a cooking pot, and having a lid to keep in the steam.

5. An apparatus for steaming grain preparatory to grinding.

6. A steam-tank (q. v.).

steamer-duck, s. [RACEHORSE, 2.]

steamer-lane, s. The usual track followed by ocean steamers plying between any two ports, e. g., Liverpool and New York.

"Moving east on a north-easterly track, a little south of steamer-lanes."—St. James's Gazette, April 6, 1887.

stēam'-ī-nēss, s. [Eng. *steam*y; -ness.] The quality or state of being steamy or vaporous; mistiness.

stēam'-y, a. [Eng. steam, s.; -y.] Consisting of or abounding in steam; resembling steam; misty, vaporous.

"Meantime, on that side *steam*y vapors rise."
Cowper: Sonnet.

stēan, s. [STEEN.]

stē-ār'-ā-mide, s. [Eng. stear(ic), and amide.]

Chemistry: (C₁₈H₃₅O)₂N. Obtained by heating ethylic stearate with alcoholic ammonia for several days in a sealed tube at a temperature of 120°. It is purified by recrystallization from alcohol and washing with ether. After melting it solidifies at 107.5.

stē-ār-ān'-īl-ide, s. [Eng. stear(ic); anil(ine), and suff. -ide.]

Chem.: (C₁₈H₃₅O)(C₆H₅)HN. Phenyl-stearamide. Formed when excess of aniline is distilled over stearic acid heated to 230° in an oil bath. The product is purified by repeated crystallization from alcohol, when it is obtained as white shining needles, melting at 93.6°, and solidifying to a mass of radiated crystals.

stē-ār-āte, s. [Eng. stear(ic); -ate.]

Chem. (pl.): Compounds of stearic acid with the alkalis and metals. They have the consistence of hard soaps and plasters, and are mostly insoluble in water. Stearate of potassium, C₁₈H₃₅KO₂, separates on cooling from a solution of one part stearic acid and one part potassic hydrate in ten parts of water. It forms shining delicate needles, having a faint alkaline taste, and dissolves in 6.7 parts boiling alcohol and 25 parts boiling water. Acid stearate of potassium, C₁₈H₃₅KO₂·C₁₈H₃₆O₂, obtained by decomposing the neutral salt with 1,000 parts of water. When dried and dissolved in alcohol, it separates in silvery scales, inodorous and soft to the touch. It dissolves in four parts of boiling absolute alcohol.

stē-ār-ēne, s. [STEARONE.]

stē-ar'-gīl-līte, s. [Formed from Eng. *stear*ite, and argillite.]

Min.: A soapy-looking clay of varying color, and like all other clays a hydrated aluminous silicate. Found near Poitiers, France.

fāte, fāt, färe, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll: trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

stē-ār'-īc, a. [English stear(in); -ic.] Derived from or containing stearin.

Chemical: $C_{18}H_{35}O_2$. An acid discovered by Chevreul, and found as a frequent constituent of fats derived from the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and especially abundant as a tristearin in beef and mutton suet. It may be obtained by saponifying the fat with soda lye, decomposing with sulphuric acid, dissolving the fatty acids in alcohol, and repeatedly crystallizing, the first portions of the fatty acid only being taken. When pure it crystallizes from alcohol in nacreous laminae or needles, is tasteless and inodorous, and has a distinct acid reaction. Its specific gravity is nearly that of water, it melts at 69-69.2°, distills in a vacuum without alteration, and is sparingly soluble in alcohol, more so in ether and benzene.

Chem.: $C_{18}H_{35}O$. Formed by the action of stearic chloride on potassic stearate. It is difficult to obtain pure.

stearic-ether, s.

Chem. (pl.): Compounds of stearic acid with the alcohol radicals. Methyl stearate, $C_{18}H_{35}(CH_3)O_2$, is formed by heating stearic acid with methyllie alcohol in a sealed tube. It is a neutral crystalline mass insoluble in water, and melting at 33°. Ethyl stearate, stearic ether, $C_{18}H_{35}(C_2H_5)O_2$. Obtained by passing hydrochloric acid gas into an alcoholic solution of stearic acid. It is a crystalline mass, resembling white wax, melts at 33.7°, and is tasteless and inodorous.

stē-a-rīd'-īc, a. [Eng. stear(in); Greek eidos=form, and Eng. suff. -ic.] Derived from or containing stearic acid.

Chem.: $C_{18}H_{34}O_2$. Obtained by heating bromostearate of silver with water. It is an amorphous mass with a peculiar faint odor, is soluble in alcohol, melts at 35°, and distills unchanged. With the alkalis it forms soaps.

stē-ar-in, s. [Gr. stear=fat, tallow, suet.]

Chemistry (pl.): Glyceric stearates. These compounds can be formed artificially, but the last is also a constituent of most of the more solid animal and vegetable fats. (1) Monostearin (q. v.). (2)

Distearin, $C_3H_5(C_{18}H_{35}O_2)_2$. Obtained by heating monostearin with stearic acid to 260° for three hours. It forms microscopic laminae, which melt at 53°. (3) Tristearin (q. v.).

stē-ar-in-ēr-ỹ, s. [Eng. stearin(e); -ery.] The process of making stearine from animal or vegetable fats; the manufacture of stearin or stearine products.

stē-ar-ō-chlōr-hỹ-drīn, s. [Eng. stearo(ne); chlorhydr(ic), and suff. -in.]

Chem.: $C_3H_5\{C_{18}H_{35}O_2\}_3$. Produced by passing hydrochloric acid gas into a mixture of stearic acid and glycerin heated to 100°. Purified from ether it forms a solid mass, melting at 28°.

stē-ar-ōc'-ōn-ōte, subst. [Pref. stearo-, and Gr. konis=powder.]

Chem.: Couerbe's name for a yellow-brown pulverulent fat which he extracted from the brain. It is insoluble in alcohol and ether, except in the presence of fixed oils, in which case it dissolves in ether.

stē-ar-ō-glū'-cōse, s. [Pref. stearo-, and Eng. glucose.]

Chemistry: $C_6H_5\{C_{18}H_{35}O_2\}_3$. Glucic stearate. Formed when stearin and anhydrous glucose are heated to 120° for fifty or sixty hours. It is obtained in microscopic granules, or as a white fusible mass, is neutral, and assumes with oil of vitriol a reddish color, changing to violet and black.

stē-ar-ō-lāu-rēt'-īn, s. [Pref. stearo-; English laur(in), and retin.]

Chem.: Grosourdi's name for the solid fat which separates on standing at +10° from the oil obtained by warm pressure from the pericarp of bay-berries. It crystallizes in warty masses but has not been further examined.

stē-ar-ō-lāu'-rīn, s. [Pref. stearo-, and Eng. laurin.]

Chem.: Grosourdi's name for a fat, deposited on standing at +6° from the oil obtained by warm pressure from the shelled seeds of the bay-berry. It forms a yellowish white mass.

stē-ar-ōl'-īc, a. [Pref. stear-, and Eng. ol(e)ic.] Derived from oleic and elaidic acid.

stearolic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{18}H_{32}O_2=C_{17}H_{31}CO_2H$. Obtained by heating the dibromide of oleic and elaidic acids with an alcoholic solution of potash. It forms long, colorless prisms, insoluble in water, slightly soluble in alcohol, melts at 48°, and volatilizes without decomposition. Its salts are mostly crystalline, those of the alkalis having the properties of soaps.

stē-ar-ōne, stē-ar-ēne, subst. [Eng. stear(ic); -one, -ene.]

Chem.: $C_{18}H_{35}O \cdot C_{17}H_{35}$. The ketone of stearic acid, produced by the dry distillation of calcic or plumbic stearate, the resulting product being finely pulverized, and then several times washed with ether. It forms delicate pearly laminae, slightly soluble in boiling alcohol, nearly insoluble in cold ether, and melts at 87.8°.

stē-ar-ō-phān'-īc, adj. [Eng. stearophan(in); -ic.] Derived from stearophanin (q. v.).

Chemistry: A kind of stearic acid obtained from Cocculus indicus berries. It crystallizes in small needles, melting at 63°.

stē-ar-ōph'-an-īn, subst. [Pref. stearo-, and Gr. phainō=to appear.]

Chem.: The fat of Cocculus indicus berries. It agrees with tristearin in nearly all its properties, but melts at 35-36°.

stē-ar-ōp'-tēne, s. [Pref. stearo-, and Gr. ptēnos=feathered; hence, fleeting, volatile.]

Chem.: Any of the more solid constituents of essential oils, which crystallize out in the cold.

stē-ar-ōx-ỹl'-īc, adj. [Pref. stear-; English ox(at)yl, and suff. -ic.] Derived from or containing stearic acid and oxatyl.

stearoxylic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{18}H_{32}O_4=C_{17}H_{31}O_2 \cdot CO_2H$. Obtained by the action of nitric acid on stearic acid. It crystallizes in brilliant plates, insoluble in water, soluble in boiling alcohol, and melts at 86°.

stē-ar-ōyl, s. [Eng. stearo(ne); -yl.]

Chemistry: $C_{18}H_{35}$. The hypothetical radical of stearone.

stē-ar-ỹl, s. [Eng. stear(ic); -yl.]

Chem.: $C_{18}H_{35}O$. The radical of stearic-acid.

stē-āt, pref. [STEATO-]

stē-at-ar'-gill-ite, s. [STEARGILLITE.]

Min.: A doubtful mineral species occurring in some porphyritic rocks near Ilmenau, Thuringia.

stē-a-tīte, s. [Gr. stear (genit. steatos)=tallow, hard fat.] The steatitis of Pliny.]

Mineralogy:

1. A term including all the massive and crystalline-massive varieties of talc (q. v.).

2. The same as SAPONITE (q. v.).

stē-a-tīt'-īc, a. [Eng. steatit(e); -ic.] Pertaining to steatite or soapstone; of the nature of or resembling soapstone.

stē-a-tō, stē-āt, pref. [Gr. stear (genit. steatos)=tallow, hard fat.] Fatty; composed of or resembling fat.

stē-āt'-ō-çēle, s. [Pref. steato-, and Gr. kēlē=a tumor.]

Pathol.: A tumor of the scrotum containing fat; scrotal hernia.

stē-a-tō-ma, s. [Gr. steatōma.]

Surg.: A wen, the contents of which resemble snet. It may arise on any part of the body, and often grows to a large size.

stē-a-tōm'-a-toūs, adj. [STEATOMA.] Of the nature of a steatoma.

stē-āt'-ō-mỹs, s. [Pref. steato-, and Gr. mys=a mouse.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Muridæ, sub-family Dendromyinae, with two species from North and South Africa.

stē-a-tōp'-ỹ-ga, s. [Pref. steato-, and Gr. pygē=the rump, the buttocks.] A great accumulation of fat in the buttocks of some Africans, especially of Hottentot women.

stē-a-tōp'-ỹ-goūs, a. [STEATOPYGA.] Pertaining or relating to steatopyga; characterized by steatopyga.

stē-at-or'-nīs, s. [Pref. steat-, and Gr. ornis=a bird. Named because the birds are extremely fat. GUACHARO-OIL.]

Ornith.: A genus of Caprimulgidæ, with a single species, Steatornis caripensis, sometimes made the type of a family Steatornithidæ. In many respects it resembles the Goat-suckers, but differs from them in being a vegetable-feeder. Since Humboldt's time, it has been found in Bogota [GUACHARO] and in Trinidad.

stē-at-or-nīth'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. steatornis, genit. steatornith(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.] [STEATORNIS.]

stē-a-tō-zō'-ōn, s. [Pref. steato-, and Gr. zōon=a living being, an animal.]

Zoöl.: A synonym of Demodex (q. v.).

stēck-ā'-dō, s. [STICKADORE.]

stēd, s. [STEAD.]

stēd'-fast, a. [STEADFAST.]

Stēd'-īng-ērš, s. pl. [See def.]

Church History: A politico-religious sect which arose early in the thirteenth century in the district of Steding, now called Oldenburg. They appear to have been a section of the Albigenses, and a crusade was organized against them by Gerhard, Archbishop of Bremen.

steē, subst. [A. S. stigan=to mount.] A ladder. (Prov.)

steēd, stede, s. [A. S. stēda=a stud-horse, a stallion (cf. stōdmyre=a stud-mare), from stōd=a stud (q. v.); Irish stead=a steed; Ger. stute=a mare; Icel. stedda=a mare; stōdhhestr=a stallion; stōdhmerr=a studmare, a brood-mare.] A horse, especially a spirited horse, or one for war or state. (Used chiefly in poetry or poetical prose.)

steēk, stēik, v. t. [A. S. stician=to pierce, to stick (q. v.).]

1. To pierce with a sharp-pointed instrument; to stitch or sew with a needle. (Scotch.)

2. To shut, to close, to fasten.

"But now, hinny, that ye hae brought us the brandy, and the mug with the het water . . . ye may steek the door."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xlv.

steēk, stēik, s. [STEEK, v.] The act of stitching with a needle; a stitch.

steēl, s. & a. [A. S. stēl, stēle, stýle; cogn. with Dut. staal; Icel. stál; Dan. staal; Sw. stål; O. H. Ger. stahal; Ger. stahl.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II.

(2) A piece of such metal used for striking sparks from flint to ignite tinder or match.

"The steel must be struck in a proper manner, and with proper materials, before the latent spark can be elicited."—Knox: Essays, ess. 70.

(3) A round rod of steel, having longitudinal striations, used for sharpening knives.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A weapon, especially an offensive weapon, as a sword, a spear, or the like.

"Brave Macbeth with his brandish'd steel . . . Carv'd out his passage."—Shakesp.: Macbeth, i. 2.

(2) Anything of extreme hardness; hardness, sternness, rigor; as, a heart of steel.

(3) A narrow slip of steel used for stiffening or expanding ladies' dresses.

"No steels are worn behind the knees."—London Daily News.

(4) A mirror. (Cartwright: Lady Errant.)

II. Technically:

1. Chem., &c.: A very remarkable and useful kind of metallic iron, intermediate between cast-iron and malleable iron, prepared by imbedding bars of malleable iron in powdered charcoal contained in a large rectangular crucible, and exposing for many hours to a full red heat. The iron takes up from one to two per cent. of carbon, becoming harder, and, at the same time, fusible, but with a certain diminution of its malleability. The product of this operation has a blistered appearance—hence called blistered steel, but this is obviated by welding a number of bars together. Bessemer steel is produced by forcing atmospheric air into melted cast iron. The color of steel is grayish-white; specific gravity 7.60-7.93. Its most remarkable property is that of becoming very hard when heated to redness and suddenly plunged into cold water. If reheated to redness, and left to cool gradually, it becomes as soft as ordinary iron. Between these two conditions any required degree of hardness may be attained. Hence, in the manufacture of steel articles, they are first forged into shape, then hardened, and, lastly, tempered by exposure to a proper degree of annealing heat, which is often judged of by the color of the thin film of oxide which appears on the surface. A temperature of 221°, indicated by a faint straw color, is the most suitable temper for lancets and razors, 250°, indicated by a brownish tint, for scissors and pen-knives. For swords, watch-springs, and all articles requiring softness and elasticity, the steel must be heated to 289°-293°, or until the surface becomes deep blue.

"Steel is eldest brother of iron, extracted from the same ore, differing from it not in kind, but degree of purity, as being the first running thereof. It is more hard and brittle (whilst iron is softer and tougher), useful for the making of English knives, sithes, shears, &c., but fine edges cannot be made thereof, as lancets for letting of blood, incision knives, razors, &c."—Fuller: Worthies; Gloucestershire.

2. Hist., &c.: In the A. V. of the Bible, the word "steel" occurs in 2 Sam. xxii. 35; Psalm xviii. 34; Job. xx. 24; and Jer. xv. 12, but in all these places bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gēm; thin, ðhis; sin, aș; expect, Xēnophon, exīst. ph = f. -cian. -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șūn;

çhin, bench; go, gēm; thin, ðhis; sin, aș; expect, Xēnophon, exīst. ph = f. -cian. -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șūn;

çhin, bench; go, gēm; thin, ðhis; sin, aș; expect, Xēnophon, exīst. ph = f. -cian. -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șūn.

the R. V. substitutes the word "brass." The Greeks are said to have derived it, as early as the Homeric age, from the Chalybes, and the name Chalybs was applied both to the people and to the metal. The Celtiberians were celebrated for their manufacture of steel in the first century, B. C. The process of hardening it by immersion in water was known in Western Europe in the eleventh or twelfth century. Then oil was substituted for water. Cast steel was first made at Attercliffe, near Sheffield, in 1740. The Bessemer process for converting pig-iron into malleable iron, and it again into steel with small consumption of fuel, was first communicated to the British Association at Cheltenham in 1856. Siemens, in 1876, produced steel direct from iron ore. The greater durability of steel now increasingly leads to its being preferred to iron, for the construction both of ships and of rails.

B. As adjective:

1. Lit.: Made of steel.
2. Fig.: Resembling steel in hardness; hence, unfeeling, stern, rigorous.

"Thy steel bosom."—Shakesp.: Sonnet 133.

steel-bronze, subst. A very hard and tenacious alloy, used as a substitute for steel in the manufacture of cannon. Its composition varies but little from that of the usual gun-metal—90 copper, 10 tin.

steel-cap, subst. A cap or head-piece of steel; armor for the head.

"He has placed the steel-cap o'er his long flowing hair."—Scott: Rokeby, v. 20.

steel-clad, a. Clad in steel or armor; mailed.

"No longer steel-clad warriors ride Along thy wild and willowed shore."

Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, iv. 1.

steel-clenched, a. Fastened or protected with steel.

"By a steel-clenched postern door."

Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, ii. 9.

steel-dight, a. Steel-clad.

"And steel-dight nobles wiped their e'e."

Scott: Thomas the Rhymer, pt. ii.

steel-engraving, s.

1. The art of engraving upon steel-plates for the purpose of producing prints or impressions in ink upon paper and other substances.

2. The design engraved upon a steel plate.

3. The impression or print taken from an engraved steel-plate.

steel-furnace, s. A metallurgic furnace in which ore or iron is treated for the production or refining of steel.

steel-headed, steel-head, steel-hed, adj. Having a head, tip, or top of steel.

"The steel-hed speares they strongly coucht, and met."
Spenser: F. Q., III. ix. 16.

Steel-headed rail:

Railway: A rail having an upper surface, or tread of steel welded on to a body of iron.

steel-hearted, a. Hard-hearted, stern, rigorous.

steel-master, s. A proprietor of steel-works.

"Iron-masters, steel-masters, iron-consumers, and export merchants, from all parts of the kingdom, will be present in great force."—London Daily Telegraph.

1. Ord. Lang.: A mill with metallic-grinding surfaces, usually of steel, but sometimes of cast-iron, as being cheaper and sufficient for the purpose.

*2. Mining: A steel-wheel revolving in contact with a flint, to make a light in a mine; used before the invention of the safety-lamp.

steel-ore, s.

Min.: A name given to the siderite (q. v.) of Nasau, because of the iron it yielded being peculiarly adapted for conversion into steel.

steel-pen, s. A pen made of steel. [PEN (2), s., I. 1. (3).]

steel-plate, s.

1. A piece of steel flattened or extended to an even surface, and of uniform thickness. They are used as armor for the sides of warships, and other purposes.

2. A plate of polished steel, on which a design is engraved for the purpose of transferring it to paper, &c., by impressing or printing.

3. An impression or plate taken from an engraved steel-plate; a steel engraving.

steel-toys, s. pl. A manufacturing term applied to small articles such as corkscrews, buckles, and similar objects, when made of polished steel.

steel-trap, subst. A trap with steel jaws and a spring to catch wild animals.

steel-wine, s. Wine in which steel filings have been placed for some time; it is used medicinally.

steel-yard, s. [STEELYARD.]

steēl, v. t. [A. S. stýlan; Icel. stēla; German stählen.]

I. Lit.: To point, overlay, or edge with steel.

"He had in his hande a great glaue, sharpe and well stelyd."—Berners: Froissart; Cronycle, vol. i., ch. lix.

II. Figuratively:

1. To fortify as with steel; to make hard, stubborn, obdurate, callous, or unfeeling; to harden, to strengthen.

"Tempered their headlong rage, their courage steeled."

Scott: Don Roderick, xiv. (Concl.)

2. To cause to resemble steel, as in smoothness, polish, or other qualities.

steēle'-ite, subst. [After Mr. J. Steele; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An altered variety of mordenite (q. v.), occurring in spheres varying in size from one to two and a half inches in diameter at Cape Split, Nova Scotia.

steēl'-ēr, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Shipwright: The foremost or aftermost plank in a strake, which is dropped short of the stern or stern-post of a vessel.

steēl'-i-nēss, subst. [Eng. steely; -ness.] The quality or state of being steely; extreme hardness.

steēl'-īng, pr. par. & s. [STEEL, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As substantive:

1. The process of welding a piece of steel on that part of a cutting instrument which is to receive the edge.

2. The process of covering a metal plate with steel by voltaic electricity for the purpose of rendering it more durable. It is applied to stereotype and engraved copper-plates.

steeling-strake, s.

Shipwright: A steeler (q. v.).

steēl'-y, stel-y, a. [Eng. steel; -y.]

1. Literally:

(1) Made of steel; consisting of steel.

"Steel through opposing plates the magnet draws,
And steely atoms calls from dust and straws."
Crabbe: Parish Register.

(2) Resembling the surface of polished steel.

2. Figuratively: Resembling steel in hardness; hard, firm, stern, inflexible.

"O tough and stely hertes, o herte more herd than flynte or other stone."—Fisher: Seuen Psalmes, Ps. 143, pt. ii.

steēl'-yard, stil-i-ard, styl-i-arde, s. [Eng. steel, and yard.]

Mech.: A balance or weighing-machine consisting of a lever with unequal arms. It is of two kinds. The Roman balance is formed by suspending the article to be weighed from the end of the shorter arm, or placing it in a scale depending therefrom, and sliding a determinate weight along the longer one till an equilibrium is obtained. The longer arm is so graduated that the figure opposite to which the weight rests indicates the weight of the article at the extremity of the shorter arm. The second form is the Danish balance (q. v.).

"It is usual with butchers and other tradesmen to weigh in the statera, commonly called the stiltards, ten or twenty pounds weight."—Boyle: Works, iii. 431.

steēn, stēan, steane, subst. [A. S. stæna.] A vessel of clay or stone.

"Upon a huge great earth-pot steane he stood,
From whose wide mouth there flowed forth the Romane flood." Spenser: F. Q., VII. vii. 42.

steēn, stēan, verb t. [STONE, s.] To line with stone or brick, as a well, a cesspool, or the like; to mend with stone, as a road. (Prov.) steēn'-bōk, s. [STEINBOK.]

steēn'-īng, stēan'-īng, s. [STEEN, v.]

Arch.: The brick or stone wall or lining of a well or cesspool, the use of which is to prevent the interruption of the surrounding soil.

Steēn'-kīrk, s. [STEINKIRK.]

steēn'-strū-pine, subst. [After Steenstrup, who first found it; suff. -ine (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in crystals and massive at Kangerdluarsuk, Greenland, associated with lepidolite and ægyrite. Hardness, 4.0; specific gravity, 3.38; color, brown. Composition: Essentially a hydrous silicate of cerium, lanthanum, didymium, thoria, soda, alumina, and sesquioxide of iron.

steēp, steēpe, step, stepe, a. & subst. [A. S. steāp=steep, high, lofty; O. Fris. stap=high; Icel. steypdhr=steep, rising high; A. S. stepan=to erect, to exalt.]

A. As adjective:

1. Making a large angle with the plane of the horizon; ascending or descending with great inclination; precipitous.

*2. Not easily accessible; lofty, elevated, high.

3. High-priced, dear. (Slang.)

B. As subst.: A precipitous place; a rock or hill sloping with a large angle to the plane of the horizon; a precipice.

"So eagerly the fiend
O'er bog, or steep, through strait, rough, dense, or rare,
With head, hands, wings, or feet, pursues his way."
Milton: P. L., ii. 948.

steep-down, a. Precipitous.

"Wash me in steep-down gulfs of liquid fire."

Shakesp.: Othello, v. 2.

†steep-grass, steep-weed, steep-wort, s.

Bot.: Pinguicula vulgaris.

steēp, stepe, stepyn, steēpe, v. t. [Icel. steypa=to make to stoop, to pour out liquids, to cast metals; stūpa=to stoop (q. v.); Sw. stōpa=to cast (metals), to steep, to sink; Dan. stōbe=to cast (metals); stōb=the steeping of grain, steeped corn.]

1. To soak in a liquid; to macerate; to dip and soak in a liquid, to imbue; to extract the essence by soaking.

"A sop in honey steep'd to charm the guard."

Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, vi. 567.

2. To wet, to make wet.

"That nought she did but wayle, and often steepe
Her dainty couch with tears, which closely she did weepe."
Spenser: F. Q., III. ii. 28.

3. To imbue thoroughly.

"With tongue in venom steeped."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, ii. 2.

steēp, steēpe, s. [STEEP, v.]

1. Something steeped or used in steeping; a fermenting liquid in which seeds are steeped to quicken germination.

*2. The state of being steeped, soaked, or imbued.

"Strait, to the house she hasted; and sweet sleepe Pour'd on each wooer; which so laid in steepe
Their drowsie temples, that each brow did nod."

Chapman: Homer's Odyssey, ii.

3. A rennet-bag.

steēp'-en, v. i. [Eng. steep, a.; -en.] To become steep, or steeper.

steēp'-ēr, s. [Eng. steep, v.; -er.] A vat in which the indigo-plant is soaked for maceration, previous to soaking in the beating-vat.

steēp'-i-nēss, s. [Eng. steepy; -ness.] The quality or state of being steepy or steep; steepness.

"The cragginess and steepness of places up and down is a great advantage to the dwellers."—Howell: Inst. for Travelers, p. 132.

steēp'-īng (2), s. [STEEP, v.] The watering or wetting of flax haulm, to facilitate the separation of the woody matter from the fiber.

steē-ple, ste-pel, s. [A. S. stýpel=a lofty tower, from steāp=lofty, high; Icel. stōpull; Low Ger. stipel.] [STEEP, a.] A tower or turret of a church or other public edifice, ending in a point, and generally intended to contain bells; the superstructure above the tower of a church; a spire, a lantern.

"The whole country was one great lake, from which the cities, with their ramparts and steeples, rose like islands."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

Bot.: Spiræa tomentosa. [HARD-HACK.]

steeple-chase, s. A kind of horse-race across country, in which ditches, hedges, fences, &c., have to be jumped. The name is derived from the fact that these races were originally run in a straight line across country from some point to a conspicuous object, generally a church steeple, which served the purpose of the modern winning-post. The course is now marked out by flags and stakes between which all the riders must pass.

steeple-chaser, s. One who rides in steeple-chases; a horse engaged in or trained for steeple-chases.

steeple-crown, s. A tall hat formerly worn by women. (Hudibras Redivivus.)

steeple-engine, s.

Steam-eng.: A form of marine engine, common on American river-boats. It derives its name from the high erection on deck required for the guides to the connecting-rod, which works above the crank-shaft.

steeple-house, s. A contemptuous name for a church.

steeple-jack, s. A man who climbs steeples and tall chimneys to effect small repairs, or to erect scaffolding.

"A steeple-jack of Sheffield . . . met with a shocking accident."—St. James's Gazette, May 11, 1887.

steē-pled (le as el), a. [Eng. steep(e); -ed.] Furnished or adorned with, or as with steeples or towers; towering up, high.

"A steepled turbant on her head she wore."

Fairfax: Godfrey of Boulogne, ix. 8.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: The ascending axis of a plant. It seeks the light, strives to expose itself to the air, and expands itself to the utmost extent of its nature to the solar rays. With regard to direction, it may be erect, pendulous, nodding, decumbent, flexuose, creeping, or climbing. It is generally cylindrical; but may be triangular, as in Carex; square, as in the Labiatae; two-edged, as in some Cacti; filiform, as in flax; or leaf-like, as in Ruscus. It consists of bundles of vascular and woody tissue embedded in various ways in cellular substance, the whole being inclosed with an epidermis. Stems may be aerial or underground. The most highly developed form of the former is the trunk of a tree, the next is that of a shrub. There are also herbaceous stems. Sometimes a plant appears stemless; only, however, because the stem is short enough to be overlooked. In duration, a stem may be annual, biennial, or perennial. In structure it may be exogenous, endogenous, or acrogenous (q. v.). Aerial stems generally branch, and bear leaves, flowers, and fruit. An underground stem is often mistaken for a root, but differs in its capacity of bearing leaves. [RHIZOME.]

2. Mechanics: The projecting-rod which guides a valve in its reciprocations.

3. Mining: A day's work.

4. Music: The line attached to the head of a note. All notes used in modern music but the semibreve, or whole note, have stems; quavers and their subdivisions have stems and hooks. In writing a "single part" for a voice or instrument, it is usual to turn the stems of notes lying below the middle line of the stave upward, of notes lying above the middle line downward. Notes on the middle line have their stems up or down as seems best. In a "short score," as for four parts, the stems of the higher part in each stave are turned up, those of the lower part down.

5. Ornith.: The main stalk of the feather, bearing all the other external parts, and usually resembling a greatly elongated cone. At the lower part, which is inserted in the skin, it is cylindrical, hollow, and transparent; higher up it is filled with a cellular pith. The parenchymatous portion of the stem is called the shaft, and it is from the flattened sides of this that the barbs issue. (Nitzsch: Pterylography, sect. i., ch. i.)

6. Shipbuild.: The upright piece of timber or bar of iron at the fore end of a vessel, to which the forward ends of the stakes are united. With wooden stems the lower end is scarfed into the keel. The upper end supports the bowsprit, and in the obtuse angle is the figure-head. The advanced edge of the stem is the cut-water. It is usually marked with a scale of feet, showing the perpendicular height above the keel, so as to mark the draught of water at the fore-part. Called also stem-post.

7. Vehicles: The bar to which the bow of a falling hood is hinged.

Bot.: Embracing the stem with its base; amplexicaul, as a leaf or petiole.

stem-head, s. The top of the stem-post (q. v.).

"A gaff trysail and a staysail tacked to the stem-head gives me sufficient sail-area for cruising."—Field, Jan. 30, 1886.

stem-knee, s.

Shipbuilding: A knee uniting the stem with the keel.

Bot.: A leaf growing from the stem.

Biol.: A name sometimes given to a contractile fibre in the pedicle of Vorticella (q. v.).

Shipbuild.: An independent piece (q. v.).

stem-post, s. [STEM, II. 6.]

stem-winder, s. A watch having a stem or pendant which may be thrown into engagement with a winding wheel, so as to wind up the spring without the intervention of a key; a keyless watch.

stēm, stemme, v. t. & i. [Eng. stem=a trunk of a tree, as a trunk thrown into a river stems or checks its current; Icel. stemma=to dam up; Dan. stemme=to stem; Ger. stemmen=to fell trees, to dam up water.]

A. Transitive:

1. To dam up; to check or stop, as a stream or moving force.

"Not being able to stem the torrent which he has allowed to burst forth."—London Globe.

2. To make way or progress against, as, a tide or current; to make way or press forward through. (Mallet: Amyntor and Theodora, i.)

3. To dash against with the stem; to strike or cut with the stem; as, The vessels stemmed each other.

*4. To steer.

"He is the master of true courage that all the time sedately stems the ship."—Cornelius Nepos in English (1723). (Dedic.)

5. To tear out the stem, as of a tobacco leaf.

B. Intrans.: To make way in opposition to some obstacle or obstruction, as a tide, a current, the wind, or the like.

"They on the trading flood . . . ply, stemming nightly toward the pole."

Milton: P. L., ii. 642.

steme, v. [STEAM, s. & v.]

stēm'-lěss, adj. [Eng. stem; -less.] Having no stem; having the stem so little developed as to appear to be wanting; acaulescent.

stēm'-lēt, s. [Eng. stem, s.; dimin. suff. -let.] A little or young stem.

stēm'-mā-tā, s. pl. [Pl. of Gr. stemma=a garland. So called because they are often arranged in a circular form on the top of the head.]

Compar. Anat.: The same as OCELLI, 2. [COM-FOUND-EYES.]

stēm-mā-tōp'-tēr-is, subst. [Gr. stemma (genit. stemmatos)=a garland, and pteris=a kind of fern, so named from the form of the markings on its surface.]

Palæobot.: Probably the external aspect of the tree-ferns of which the internal one is Psaronius (q. v.). It is of considerable size, and occurs in the Devonian and Carboniferous rocks. It is not accepted as a genuine genus.

stēm-māt'-ō-pūs, s. [Gr. stemma (genit. stemmatos)=a wreath, a garland, and ops=the countenance.]

Zoöl.: Cuvier's name for the Hooded Seal, to which he gave generic distinction as Stemmatopus cristatus (=Phoca cristata=Cystophora cristata).

stemme, v. & s. [STEM, v. & s.]

stēm'-mēr, s. [Eng. stem, v.; -er.]

1. Mining: A piece of iron with which clay is rammed into the blasting-holes to make them water-tight.

2. Tobacco Manuf.: One who tears out the stems of tobacco leaves.

stēm'-mē-rŷ, s. [Eng. stem; -ery.] A place or factory where tobacco is stemmed; usually spoken of as a dry stemmery.

stēm'-mīng, s. [STEM, v.]

Mining: The stuff beaten down upon a charge of powder.

stē-mō-nī'-tīs, s. [Greek stēmōn=warp, spun thread.]

Bot.: A genus of Myxogastrous Fungals. Small, stamen-shaped plants, separate or fasciculate, growing on rotten wood. Stemonitis fusca is abundant in hothouses.

stēm'-ple, s. [Perhaps a nasalized dimin. from step, s.]

Mining: One of the cross-bars of wood placed in the shaft of a mine and serving the purpose of steps.

"The transverse pieces of wood for this purpose they call stemples."—Rees: Cyclopædia.

stēm'-sōn, s. [STEM, s.]

Shipbuild.: A knee-piece whose horizontal arm is scarfed to the keelson and vertical arm fayed into the throats of the transoms.

"Stemson and keelson and sternson-knee."

Longfellow: Building of the Ship.

"Or foaming strang, wi' hasty stens."

Burns: Elegy on Capt. M. Henderson.

stēn-ān'-thī-ūm, s. [Pref. sten-, and Gr. anthos=a flower.]

Bot.: A genus of Veratree, closely akin to Veratrum. Segments of the perianth united at the base, and adhering to the ovary. Stenanthium frigidum, called in Mexico Savoeja, has a rod-like stem, grassy leaves, and a long terminal panicle of flowers. It is poisonous, stupefying animals which eat it.

stēn-ās'-tēr, s. [Pref. sten-, and Gr. astēr=a star (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: A synonym of Urastrella (q. v.).

stēnch, stenche, stinch, stinche, s. [A. S. stenc, from stanc, pa. t. of stincan=to stink (q. v.); Ger. stank.]

*1. A smell; a scent of any kind.

"Black bulls and bearded goats on altars lie,

And clouds of savory stench involve the sky,"

Dryden: Homer's Iliad, i. 441.

2. A foul or offensive smell; a stink.

"The stench remains, the luster dies away."

Couper: Conversation, 678.

stench-trap, s. A depression in a drain made to collect water, so as to prevent the reflex current of air.

stēnch (1), v. t. [STENCH, s.] To cause to stink.

"A boast how vain! What wrecks abound!

Dead bards stench every coast."

Young: Resignation, i.

stēnch (2), v. t. [STANCH, v.] To stanch or staunch; to stop the flow of.

"Restraining to stench, and incrustatives to thicken the blood."—Harvey: On Consumption.

stēn-ē-lŷ'-trā, s. pl. [Pref. sten-, and Eng. elytra, pl. of elytron (q. v.).]

Entom.: The third sub-tribe or family of Heteromera in Latreille's arrangement. Oblong, convex beetles, with long legs and antennæ, the latter thickened at their extremities. They live under the bark of trees, or on leaves and flowers. Genera: Helops, Cistela, Edemera, &c.

stēn-ē-ō-fī-bēr, s. [Gr. stenos (genit. steneos)=a narrow, confined space, and Lat. fiber=a beaver.] Palæont.: A genus of Castoridae, from the Miocene of France.

stēn-ē-ō-sāu'-rūs, s. [Gr. stenos (genit. steneos)=a narrow, confined space, and sauros=a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Amphicælian Crocodiles, with six species from the Jurassic. With the exception of their biconcave vertebræ, they present many points of resemblance to the living Gavials. They attained a considerable size, for the skull of one species, Stenosaurus herberti, is about forty inches long.

stēn'-ī-ā, s. [STENUS.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Steniadæ.

stē-nī'-ā-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. stenia; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -(i)dæ.]

Entom.: A family of Pyralidina. Antennæ of the male pubescent, or slightly ciliated; abdomen very long and slender; anterior wings narrow, lanceolate.

stēn'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sten(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: An old family of Brachelytra, now generally merged in Staphylinidæ. Very active little beetles with cylindrical bodies and prominent eyes; found in moist places.

stēn-ō, stēn-, pref. [Gr. stenos=narrow; cf. en stenō=in a narrow compass.] Small, narrow, confined; in a small compass.

stēn-ō-brān'-chī-æ, s. pl. [Pref. steno-, and Mod. Lat. branchiæ=gills.]

Ichthy.: A section of Siluridæ (q. v.), with one group, Doradina, comprising several genera from South America, and one (the most important) from tropical Africa. [SYNODONTIS.] The rayed dorsal, if present, is short; gill-membranes confluent with the skin of the isthmus.

stēn-ōch'-rō-mŷ, subst. [Pref. steno-, and Gr. chrōma=color.]

Printing: The production of many colors at one impression. Mr. E. Meyerstein described his method of doing this at the Society of Arts (Dec. 13, 1876).

stēn-ō-cō-rō'-nīne, a. [Pref. steno-; Latin corona=a crown, and Eng. suff. -ine.]

Zoöl.: Having narrow-crowned molar teeth.

"It has been suggested to me that the contrasted terms of Dinotherian and Hippopotamine types may mislead, through being supposed to imply a greater amount both of affinity and of difference than is intended. I propose, therefore, to substitute for the former Eurycoronine or broad-crowned type, and for the latter Stenocoronine, or narrow-crowned type."—Falconer: Palæont. Memoirs, ii. 83. (Note.)

stēn'-ō-dērm, s. [STENODERMA.] Any individual of the genus Stenoderma (q. v.).

stēn-ō-dēr'-mā, s. [Pref. steno-, and Gr. derma=skin.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Stenodermata (q. v.). Crown of head slightly elevated; muzzle very short, and broad; nose-leaf well developed in front of nasal aperture; interfemoral membrane short. Three species, Stenoderma achradophilum, S. rufum, and S. falcatum. The genus is divided into several sub-genera.

stēn-ō-dēr'-mā-tā, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. pl. of stenoderma (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: A group of Bats, family Phyllostomidæ (q. v.), from the Neotropical region. Muzzle very short, and generally broad in front; nose-leaf generally short, horseshoe-shaped in front and lanceolate behind; interfemoral membrane always concave behind; no tail; inner margin of lips fringed with conical papillæ.

(2) Moving as fast; keeping together.

3. To take a step (or steps): To make a movement in a certain direction (Lit. & fig.), to move in a matter; to take action.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, plt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

step-bit, s.

Locksmith.: A notched key-bit.

step-box, s.

Mach.: A case for a bearing surface at the lower end of a vertical spindle or shaft.

step-down transformer, s. Elect.: A transformer employed for lowering electric pressure.

step-ladder, subst. A portable ladder, usually having flat steps, and its own means of support by struts or posts.

step-stone, s. A stepping-stone (q. v.).

step-up transformer, s. Elect.: A transformer employed for raising electric pressure.

step-wheels, s. pl. Wheels having several sets of teeth on the circumference forming a series of steps. (Rossiter.) stēp-, pref. [A. S. steóp=orphaned, deprived of its parent; cogn. with Dut. stief, as in stiefzoon, stiefdochter, &c.; Icel. stjúp, as stjúpson, stjúp dóttir, &c.; Dan. sted, as in stedbarn; Sw. stuf, as in stufbarn; Ger. stief, as in stiefsohn, stieftochter, &c.; O. H. Ger. stiuf. Cf. O. H. Ger. stiufan=to deprive of parents.] A prefix used before child, brother, sister, father, mother, daughter, and the like, to signify that the person spoken of is a relative only by the marriage of a parent. It was originally used in the compounds stepchild, stepbairn, stepson, and stepdaughter, as referring to orphaned persons (see etym.), and was afterward extended to stepfather, stepmother, &c.

stēp'-bairn, s. [A. S. steópbearn.] A stepchild (q. v.).

stēp'-bróth-ēr, s. [Pref. step-, and Eng. brother.] A stepfather or stepmother's son by a former wife or husband.

stēp'-child, s. [A. S. steópcild.] The child of a husband or wife by a former wife or husband.

stēp'-dāme, s. [Pref. step-, and Eng. dame.] A stepmother.

"His cruell stepdame, seeing what was done."

Spenser: F. Q., I. v. 39.

stēp'-dāugh-tēr (gh silent), s. [A. S. steópdoh-tor.] The daughter of a husband or wife by a former wife or husband.

stepe, a. [STEEP, a.]

stēp'-fa-ther, s. [A. S. steópfæder.] A mother's second or subsequent husband.

stēph-ān'-i-a, s. [Named after S. Stephan, Professor of Botany at Moscow, who died in 1817.]

Bot.: A genus of Cissampelidæ. The root of Stephania hernandifolia, an Indian plant, is an astringent useful in fevers, urinary diseases, dyspepsia, &c.

stēph'-an-ite, s. [After the Archduke Stephan of Austria; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An ore of silver occurring both in crystals and massive. Crystallization, orthorhombic. Hardness, 2-2½; specific gravity, 6.269; luster, metallic; color and streak, iron-black. Composition: Sulphur, 16.2; antimony, 15.3; silver, 68.5=100, corresponding with the formula 5AgS+Sb₂S₃. Occurs with other silver ores in lodes in various localities.

stēph-a-nō-, pref. [Gr. stephanos=a crown, a garland.]

Phys.: Resembling a crown or garland; bearing circular processes.

stēph-a-nōç-ēr-ās, s. [Pref. stephano-, and Gr. keras=a horn.] [AMMONITE, B. II. 2.]

stēph-a-nōç-ēr-ōs, s. [STEPHANOCERAS.]

Zool.: A genus of Floscularidæ. Eyes single; rotatory organ divided into five tentacular lobes, furnished with vibratile cilia, with which the animal takes its prey; body attached by the base to a cylindrical hyaline tube. One species, Stephanoceros eichhornii, $\frac{3}{8}$ inch long, from fresh water.

stēph-a-nō-mō-nād'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin stephanomonas, genit. stephanomonad(is); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Cilio-Flagellata; animalcules free-swimming, bearing a single terminal flagellum, the base of which is embraced by a brush-like fascicle, or uninterrupted circular wreath of cilia. One genus, Stephanomonas, with one, or possibly two, species. (Kent.)

stēph-a-nō-sçy'-phūs, s. [Pref. stephano-, and Gr. skyphos=a cup.]

Zool.: The only known genus of Thecomedusæ. Animal consisting of a series of chitinous tubes embedded in a sponge, and opening by oscula. From these the animal, which has a crown of tentacles, at intervals protrudes itself.

stēph-a-nūr'-ūs, s. [Pref. stephan(o)-, and Gr. oura=the tail.]

Zool.: A genus of Strongylidæ (q. v.), allied to Strongylus (q. v.). Stephanurus dentatus probably produces, in whole or in part, the hog-cholera of the United States.

stēp'-mōth-ēr, *step-mod-er, s. [A. S. steóp-móder.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A father's second or subsequent wife.

"You shall not find me, daughter,
After the slander of most stepmothers,
Ill-eyed unto you." Shakesp.: Cymbeline, i. 1.

2. Bot.: Viola tricolor.

stēp'-mōth-ēr-lý, a. [English stepmother; -ly.] Of, belonging to, or befitting a stepmother; hence, neglectful, harsh.

"A long period of stepmotherly treatment."—London Daily News.

stēp'-pār-ent, s. [Pref. -step, and Eng. parent.] A stepfather or stepmother.

stēppe, subst. [Russ. stepe=a waste, a heath, a steppe.] A term applied to one of those extensive plains which, with the occasional interpolation of low ranges of hills, stretch from the Dnieper across the southeast of European Russia, round the shores of the Caspian and Aral seas, between the Altai and Ural chains, and occupy the low lands of Siberia. In spring they are covered with verdure, but for the greater part of the year they are dry and barren.

¶ There are three different kinds of steppe, viz., grass, salt, and sand steppes, each maintaining peculiar forms of vegetation.

steppe-murraín, s. The rinderpest (q. v.).

stēpped, a. [Eng. step; -ed.] Having steps or grades.

stepped-gauge, subst. A form of gauge having a series of notches which may fit varying sizes of holes.

stepped-gearing, s.

Mach.: An invention of Dr. Hooke for obtaining a continuous bearing between the meshing surfaces of gear-wheels.

stepped-key, s.

Locksmith.: The same as BIT-KEY (q. v.).

stepped-rack, s. A rack having teeth arranged in several rows, which alternate with each other so as to produce the uniformity of motion due to smaller teeth, without sacrifice of strength. The teeth of the pinion with which it gears are, of course, correspondingly arranged.

stēp'-pēr, s. [Eng. step, v.; -er.] One who steps; one that has a gait, good or bad; specif. applied to a horse, in reference to his high action in trotting. [HIGH-STEPPER.]

"The man who wants a pair of steppers."—Field, Jan. 16, 1886.

stēp'-piŋg, pr. par., a. & s. [STEP, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: A step; motion; progress or advance.

"But still the flood crept by little steppings."—Bp. Taylor: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 8.

stepping-stone, s.

1. Lit.: A raised stone in a stream or swampy places, by stepping on which a person may cross without wetting or dirtying the feet.

2. Fig.: An aid or means for the accomplishment of an end or the gaining of an object; a help, an advantage.

"Those obstacles his genius had turned into stepping-stones."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

stēp'-sis-tēr, s. [Pref. step-, and Eng. sister.] A stepfather or stepmother's daughter by a former wife or husband.

stēp'-sōn, *step-sone, s. [A. S. steópsunu.] The son of a husband or wife by a former wife or husband.

-stēr, suff. [A. S. -estre (the same as in the Lat. oleaster, Low Lat. poetaster). Cf. Dut. spinster=a spinster; zangster=a female singer. In A. S. we also find hearpester=a female harper, webbestre=a female weaver, fithelestre=a female fiddler, fæcestre, &c.] A suffix denoting occupation; as, maltster, gamester, songster, huckster, &c. Up to the end of the thirteenth century the suffix -ster was a characteristic sign of the feminine gender, and by its means new feminines could be always formed from the masculine. In the fourteenth century the suff. -ster began to give place to the Norman-French -ess, and there is consequently a want of uniformity in the employment of this suffix. Thus Robert de Brunne uses sangster (songster) as a masculine. A good number of words with this suffix are to be found as feminines even late in the fifteenth century; as, kempster, webster, sewster, baxter, &c. In modern English there is only one feminine with this suffix, viz., spinster, though huckster was used very late as a feminine, and sewster is still used in Scotland and provincial dialects. When the original feminine force of the suffix -ster was forgotten or lost, some new feminines were formed from English feminines by the addition of the French suffix -ess; as, seamster, seamstress, songster, songstress, which are thus really double feminines.

"The suffix -ster now often marks the agent with more or less a sense of contempt and depreciation, as punster, trickster."—Morris: English Accidence, p. 90.

stēr-, pref. [STEREO-.]

stēr-ā'-dī-an, s. [Gr. stereos=solid, and Eng. radian.] A unit of solid angle.

stēr-cōr-ā'-ceous (ce as sh), a. [Lat. stercus (genit. stercoris)=dung.] Pertaining to or composed of dung; partaking of the nature of dung.

stercoraceous-vomiting, s.

Pathol.: Vomiting of fecal matter, sometimes occurring in enteritis and obstruction of the bowels.

Stēr'-cōr-ān-ism, s. [STERCORANISM.]

Church History: The belief that the Eucharistic elements suffered physical change in the body of the recipient. During the controversy on Transubstantiation, in the eleventh century, the charge of stercoranism was brought against the believers in and the objectors to that dogma by their respective opponents.

"It is not easy to determine the precise form of this indecent charge as advanced by either party. The believers in transubstantiation supposed the sacramental elements not to pass through the human body like ordinary aliments, but to become wholly incorporated with the bodies of the communicants; so that on their principles they could not be justly charged with stercoranism. On the contrary, the opposers of transubstantiation supposed the substance of the sacramental elements to undergo the ordinary changes in the stomach and bowels of the communicant; so that by assuming that these elements had become the real body and blood of Christ, they might be charged with stercoranism; but it was only by assuming what they expressly denied, namely, the truth of the doctrine of transubstantiation. Thus neither party could be justly taxed with this odious consequence; and yet a dexterous disputant, by resorting to a little perversion of his antagonist's views, might easily cast upon him this vulgar and unseemly reproach."—Mosheim: Eccles. Hist. (ed. Keid), p. 313. (Note 2.)

Stēr'-cōr-ān-ist, s. [French stercoraniste, from Eccles. Lat. stercoranista, from Lat. stercus (genit. stercoris)=dung.]

Eccles.: One charged with holding that the Eucharistic elements suffered physical change in the body of the recipient. The word appears to have been first applied by Card. Humbert, about the middle of the eleventh century, to the Greek monk Nicephas.

Stēr-cō-rār'-i-an, s. [Latin stercorarius=pertaining to dung.] The same as STERCORANIST (q. v.).

stēr-cō-rār'-i-i-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin stercorari(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.] [STERCORARIUS.]

stēr-cō-rār'-i-ūs, s. [Lat.=pertaining to dung.] Ornith.: Skua (q. v.), a genus of Laridæ, in some classifications made a sub-family Stercorariinæ. These birds were at first classed with the Gulls [LARUS], but were separated on account of differences in external character and habits, and placed in a separate genus, Lestris (q. v.). The Linnæan name Stercorarius was adopted by Brisson, with a generic description (Ornithol., vi. 150), in 1760, and is now revived by those authors who are endeavoring to purify nomenclature and to restore to use names originally given.

stēr-cōr-ār-ý, s. [Low Lat. stercorarium, from Latin stercus (genit. stercoris)=dung.] A place, properly secured from the weather, for containing dung.

stēr-cōr-āte, v. t. [Lat. stercoratus, pa. par. of stercoro=to manure, from stercus (genit. stercoris)=dung.] To manure, to dung.

"Mold stercorated or unstercorated."—Scott: Pirate, ch. iv.

stēr-cōr-ā-tion, s. [Latin stercoratio.] The act of dunging; the act of manuring with dung.

"The stercoration of the soil, and promotion of the growth, though not the first germination of the seminal plant."—Ray: On the Creation, i.

stēr-cōr'-i-an-ism, s. [STERCORANISM.]

stēr-cōr-ic'-ō-loūs, adj. [Latin stercus (genit. stercoris)=dung, and colo=to inhabit.] Living in dung.

"This appears to be probably the case in parasitic and stercoricolous forms."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xix. 892.

stēr-cōr-ist, s. [Lat. stercus (genit. stercoris)=dung.] A stercoranist.

"Writers like Sanchez and the Stercorists who had opened frivolous and unbecoming questions."—J. Morley: Voltaire, ch. v.

stēr'-cōr-ite, s. [Latin stercus, genit. stercor(is)=dung; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral found in crystalline masses and nodules in the guano of Ichaboe. Composition:

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhün; -tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhüş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

Phosphoric acid, 34.05; ammonia, 12.40; soda, 14.92; water, 38.63=100, corresponding with the formula $\text{NaO}, \text{NH}_4\text{O}, \text{PO}_5+9\text{HO}$. This is a native microcosmic salt (q. v.).

stēr'-cōr-ŷ*, subst. [STERCORIST.] Excrement, dung.

stēr-cū'-lē-æ, s. pl. [Modern Lat. stercul(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Sterculiaceæ. Leaves simple or palmate; flowers by abortion, unisexual.

stēr-cū'-lī-a, s. [From a Latin God, Sterculus, who presided over manuring; stercus=a dung. So named because the leaves of some species are fetid.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Sterculiaceæ (q. v.). Trees with soft timber; leaves simple or compound; inflorescence in racemes or panicles; flowers polygamous or monœcious; calyx somewhat coriaceous, five-lobed; petals none; carpels follicular, five or fewer, each with one cell and one or many seeds. Sterculia urens is a large Indian tree, with white bark, cordate leaves, and very small flowers in terminal panicles, coming out in February or March. The tree yields an inferior sort of tragacanth, used in the hospitals at Bombay and in making sweetmeats, and native guitars are made of the wood. Its seeds are cathartic. S. villosa, another Indian tree, yields a similar gum of little value. The bark of these, and of S. colorata and S. guttata, also Indian trees, yield fibers adapted for cordage. An oil may be extracted from the seeds of S. fetida, a large East Indian evergreen, by boiling them in water. The seeds of S. tomentosa and S. acuminata, African species, when chewed and sucked, render half-putrid water agreeable. S. tragacantha, of Sierra Leone, yields tragacanth (q. v.). The nuts of S. balanghas, S. fetida, and S. urens are eaten in India, and are sometimes roasted like coffee, as are those of S. nobilis in the East Indies, and those of S. chicha and S. lasiantha in Brazil.

stēr-cū'-lī-ā'-çē-æ, s. pl. Mod. Lat. sterculi(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Sterculiads; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Malvales. Large trees or shrubs, having the hairs, if present, stellate. Leaves with free deciduous stipules; calyx naked or surrounded by an involucre; sepals five, more or less united at the base, æstivation generally valvate; petals five or none, æstivation convolute; stamens indefinite, monadelphous; anthers two-celled, turned outward; styles five or three; fruit capsular, three or five-celled, or drupaceous, berried, or consisting of distinct follicles; seeds sometimes winged or woolly. Natives of warm countries. Tribes, Bombacæ, Helicteræ, and Sterculæ. Genera, 34; species, 125. (Lindley.)

stēr-cū'-lī-ād, s. [Mod. Lat. sterculi(a); Eng. suff. -ad.]

Bot. (pl.): The Sterculiaceæ (q. v.).

stère, subst. [Fr., from Gr. stereos=solid.] The French unit for solid measure, equal to a cubic metre, or 35.3156 cubic feet.

stēr-ēl'-mīn'-thā*, s. pl. [Pref. ster-, and Greek helmins (genit. helminthos)=a tape-worm.]

Zoöl.: Owen's name for one of the two classes into which he divided the Entozoa, the other being Cœlelmintha. It is equivalent to the Trematoda (q. v.). [See extract under Cœlelmintha.]

stēr-ē-ō, stēr-ē-ō, pref. [Gr. stereos=solid.] Solid; having an appearance of solidity.

¶ Authorities differ as to the pronunciation of the first e in this prefix. In printing, however, stēr-ē-ō is always used.

stēr'-ē-ō, s. [Abbrev. from stereotype (q. v.).] The same as STEREOTYPE, 1.

¶ Used also adjectively; as, a stereo plate.

stēr'-ē-ō-bāte, s. [Pref. stereo-, and Gr. basis=a base (q. v.).]

Arch.: A base; the lower part or basement of a building or column; a kind of continuous pedestal under a plain wall.

stēr'-ē-ō-chrōme, s. [Pref. stereo-, and Eng. chrome.] A stereochromic picture.

stēr'-ē-ō-chrōm'-īc, adjective. [English stereochrom(y); -ic.] Of or pertaining to stereochromy; produced by stereochromy.

stēr-ē-ōch'-rō-mŷ, subst. [STEREOCHROME.] A method of wall painting in which the colors are covered with a varnish of soluble glass.

stēr-ē-ō-dēl'-phīs, subst. [Pref. stereo-, and Gr. delphs=a dolphin.]

Palæont.: A genus of Delphinidæ (q. v.), from Miocene strata.

stēr-ē-ō-ē-lēc'-trīc, a. [Pref. stereo-, and Eng. electric.]

Elect.: Of or pertaining to the generation of electricity by solids alone; thus, a stereoelectric current is one produced without the intervention of a liquid. (Dana.)

stēr-ē-ōg'-nā-thūs, s. [Pref. stereo-, and Gr. gnathos=a jaw.]

Palæont.: A mammalian genus of unknown affinities, founded on a fragment of a small jaw, with three molars in position, from the Lower Oolite at Stonesfield, Oxfordshire, England.

stēr'-ē-ō-grām, stēr'-ē-ō-grāph, subst. [Greek stereos=solid; suff. -gram, -graph.] The representation of a solid on a plane; specifically, a stereoscopic slide.

stēr'-ē-ō-grāph, s. [STEREOGRAM.]

stēr'-ē-ō-grāph'-īc, stēr'-ē-ō-grāph'-īc-āl, adj. [Eng. stereograph(y); -ic, -ical.] Made or done according to the rules of stereography; delineated on a plane.

stereographic-projection, s. That projection of the sphere which is represented upon the plane of one of its great circles, the eye being situated at the pole of that great circle. All circles are projected either into straight lines or circles, and the angle made by two circles meeting on the globe is the same as that made by the projections of those circles. It is the projection generally employed in ordinary atlases. The distortion in the form of countries on the plane surface is very slight.

stēr-ē-ō-grāph'-īc-āl-lŷ, adv. [English stereographical; -ly.] In a stereographic manner; according to the rules of stereography; by delineation on a plane.

stēr-ē-ōg'-rā-phŷ, s. [STEREOGRAM.] The art of delineating the forms of solid bodies on a plane; a branch of solid geometry which demonstrates the properties and shows the construction of all solids which are regularly defined.

stēr-ē-ōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. stereo-, and English meter.]

1. An instrument for measuring the solid or liquid contents or the capacity of a vessel.

2. An instrument for determining the specific gravity of porous bodies, powders, &c.

stēr-ē-ō-mēt'-ric, stēr-ē-ō-mēt'-ric-āl, adj. [Eng. stereometr(y); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or performed by stereometry.

stēr-ē-ōm'-ē-trŷ, s. [Eng. stereometer; -y.]

1. The art of measuring solid bodies and determining their solid contents.

2. The art or process of determining the specific gravity of liquids, porous bodies, &c.

stēr-ē-ō-mōn'-ō-scōpe, s. [Pref. stereo-, Greek monos=alone, and skopeō=to see.] An instrument with two lenses by which a stereoscopic effect can be obtained from a single picture. (Proc. Roy. Soc., June, 1857, and April, 1858.)

stēr-ē-ōp'-tī-cōn, s. [Prefix stereo-, and Greek optikos=of or for seeing or sight.] A name for a magic lantern in which photographic slides are employed.

stēr'-ē-ō-scōpe, s. [Pref. stereo-, and Gr. skopeō=to see.]

Optics: An instrument invented by Wheatstone and improved by Brewster, for giving a flat picture the appearance of a solid object. Perception of perspective and what is termed the solidity of an object depends on the fact that in consequence of the distance between the eyes the right eye sees part of the object which is invisible to the left eye, and vice versa, the two separate images being combined by the brain into one impression. If a landscape, &c., is viewed with one eye alone, the effect of perspective to a great extent vanishes. The stereoscopic effect is also lessened by distance. In order to obtain a due effect from a stereoscopic slide, two pictures are necessary, one representing the object as seen by the right eye alone, the other representing it as seen by the left eye alone, and these pictures must be so arranged that each eye sees only the corresponding picture. Brewster's stereoscope consists of a box divided by an opaque partition down the middle, the slide being placed at the bottom of the box, and then viewed through a pair of half-lenses or prisms, which act upon the light rays proceeding from the pictures in such a way that the virtual images of the two pictures are coincident in position; the two images are combined by the brain into one impression; and the appearance of solidity of the scene or object is accurately reproduced. In Wheatstone's original instrument mirrors were employed instead of half-lenses or prisms. In the binocular microscope a certain amount of stereoscopic effect is obtained.

stēr-ē-ō-scōp'-īc, stēr-ē-ō-scōp'-īc-āl, a. [English stereoscop(e); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining or adapted to the stereoscope; produced by the stereoscope.

"These observations will be found useful in obtaining stereoscopic views of the structures in carpentry and ship-building."—Brewster: Stereoscope, p. 188.

stereoscopic-slide, s.

Optics: A slip of cardboard on which are mounted side by side two photographs of the same scene or object. Theoretically, these photographs should be taken by similar lenses from points of view separated by a space equal to the distance between the human eyes, but in practice—especially in dealing with architectural groups—the space is increased in order to procure a greater effect.

stēr-ē-ō-scōp'-īc-āl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. stereoscopical; -ly.] In a stereoscopic manner; by means of a stereoscope.

stēr-ē-ōs'-cō-pīst, s. [Eng. stereoscop(e); -ist.] One who is skilled in the use or manufacture of stereoscopes.

stēr-ē-ōs'-cō-pŷ, s. [Eng. stereoscop(e); -y.] The art of using or manufacturing stereoscopes or stereoscopic pictures.

stēr-ē-ō-spēr'-mūm, s. [Pref. stereo-, and Gr. sperma=seed.]

Bot.: A genus of Bignoniaceæ. Trees from tropical Asia and Africa, with unequally pinnate leaves and terminal panicles of fragrant flowers, generally white. The bark of Stereospermum suaveolens, an Indian plant, yields a gum of the hog or tragacanth series, and the root and bark are used in Hindu medicine, as are the roots, leaves, and flowers of S. chelonoides. Both are large trees with deciduous leaves.

stēr-ē-ō-stāt'-īc, adj. [Pref. stereo-, and Eng. static.] Applied to a linear arch sustaining the pressure of a material in which at any given point there are a pair of conjugate pressures, one vertical and the other in a fixed direction, horizontal or inclined. The conditions involve the symmetrical distribution of the vertical load on either side of a vertical axis, traversing the crown of the arch.

stēr-ē-ō-tōm'-īc, stēr-ē-ō-tōm'-īc-āl, a. [Eng. stereotom(y); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or performed by stereotomy.

stēr-ē-ōt'-ō-mŷ, s. [Pref. stereo-, and Gr. tomē=a cutting.] The science or art of cutting solids into certain figures or sections.

stēr'-ē-ō-trōpe, s. [Pref. stereo-, and Gr. tropē=a turning; trepō=to turn.] An instrument by which an object is perceived as if in motion, and with an appearance of solidity or relief as in nature. It consists of a series of stereoscopic pictures, generally eight, of an object in the successive positions it assumes in completing any motion, affixed to an octagonal drum, revolving under an ordinary lenticular stereoscope, and viewed through a solid cylinder pierced in the entire length by two apertures, which makes four revolutions for one of the picture-drum. The observer thus sees the object constantly in one place, but its parts apparently in motion, and in solid and natural relief.

stēr'-ē-ō-tŷpe, stēr'-ē-ō-tŷpe, s. & a. [Greek stereos=solid, and Eng. type (q. v.).]

A. As substantive:

1. Fixed type; hence a plate cast from a plaster or papier-maché mold, on which is a facsimile of the page of type as set up by the compositor, and which, when fitted to a block, may be used under the press, exactly as movable type. The alloy for stereotype plates is composed of the same materials as ordinary type-metal. An alloy composed of 500 lead, 300 tin, and 225 cadmium, has, on account of its hardness, been pronounced the best for stereotype plates. The original, or plaster process of stereotyping, was invented by William Ged, a goldsmith of Edinburgh, who was employed by the University of Oxford, in 1731, to manufacture plates for Bibles and Prayer-books. In this process the type is set up in the usual way, except that shoulder-high spaces and quadrats are employed. The face of the form is thinly and evenly oiled with a brush, and it is surrounded by a rectangular frame termed a flask. Plaster of paris mixed with water is then poured upon it, forming a mold corresponding to the face of the form. When this has sufficiently hardened, it is dried in an oven until all the moisture is driven off, and it is then used as a mold to obtain a facsimile in stereotype metal of the form of type. This system, however, has been to a great extent superseded by the papier-maché process, invented by Wilson, in Scotland, in 1823. This is a very expeditious process, and is generally used on the daily papers of large circulation. A paper matrix is formed by spreading paste over a sheet of moderately thick unsized paper, and covering it with successive sheets of tissue-paper, each carefully patted down smooth, and the pack then saturated. The face of the type is oiled, the face of the paper laid upon the type, and then the matrix dabbed by a beating-brush from the back, so as to drive the soft paper into all the interstices between the letters of the form. A reinforce sheet of damp matrix paper is laid upon the back of the matrix, and the matrix beaten again, to perfect the impression and establish a junction. The hollows in the back are filled up, and the matrix, after being covered with a double thickness of blanket, is placed in a press and subjected to strong pressure over a steam-chest, the heat of which dries the matrix. The press is unscrewed, the matrix removed, its edges pared, and it is warmed on the molding-press. The matrix is then placed in the previously-heated iron casting-mold; a casting-gauge to determine the thickness of the stereotype is placed round three sides of the matrix, the other side being left open for a gate, at which the molten metal is poured in. The cover is screwed tight, the mold tipped to bring the mouth up, and the metal poured in. When the metal is set, the mold is opened and the matrix removed. The plate is then trimmed and otherwise prepared in the usual manner. For rotary printing-machines both matrix and plate form the segment of a circle to enable the plate to fit on the impression cylinder. [ELECTROTYPE.]

2. The art of making solid plates forming an exact facsimile of the page of type as set up by the compositor, and from which impressions are taken in the usual manner; the process of producing printed work in such a manner.

B. As adjective:

stēr'-il, s. [Etym. doubtful.] (See extract.)

"To lade so many thousand sterils or measures of corn out of Sardinia and Sicily custom-free."—Howell: Letters, p. 118.

stēr'-ile, *stēr'-il, *stēr'-ill, adj. [Fr. stérile, from Lat. sterilem, accus. of sterilis=barren, unfruitful; Ital. sterile; Sp. esterile. From the same root as Gr. stereos=hard, solid; Ger. starr=rigid.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Barren, unfruitful; producing little or no crop; not fertile.

"The sterill coasts of barren Rinoceere
They past, and seas where Casius hill doth stand."
Fairefax: Godfrey of Boulogne, xv. 15.

(2) Barren; producing no young; of seeds or plants, not germinating, not producing other plants.

(3) Not accompanied with good crops; unproductive.

stēr-il'-i-ty, *ster-il-i-tie, subst. [Fr. stérilité, from Lat. sterilitatem, accus. of sterilitas, from sterilis=sterile (q. v.); Sp. esterilidad; Ital. sterilità.]

I. Literally:

1. The quality or state of being sterile; barrenness, unproductiveness, unfruitfulness.

"Sterility has been said to be the bane of horticulture."
—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 1859), p. 9.

¶ Sterility in animals and plants may be constitutional or accidental, and often arises from changed conditions of life. Thus most raptorial birds from the tropics do not lay fertile eggs in captivity in temperate climates, and many exotic plants brought to England have worthless pollen. Sometimes a little more or less water will decide whether or not a plant will seed. There are various degrees of sterility in first crosses and hybrids; occasionally there is an absence of some element necessary to reproduction, thus in the more sterile kinds of hybrid rhododendrons pollen is wanting. (Darwin.)

2. Barrenness, unfruitfulness; want or absence of power of producing young, as of animals.

II. Fig.: Barrenness of ideas or sentiments; want of fertility or the power of producing sentiment.

"One cannot ascribe this to any sterility of expression, but to the genius of his times."—Pope: Essay on Homer.

stēr-il-i-zā-tion, *stēr-il-i-gā-tion, s. [Eng. sterilize(e); -ation.] The act of making sterile, barren, or unproductive.

"These experiments destroy any hope of a practical result being obtained by sterilisation from cold."—London Daily Telegraph.

stēr-il-ize, stēr-il-ize, v. t. [Eng. steril(e); -ize.]

1. To make sterile, barren, or unproductive; to impoverish, as land; to exhaust of fertility.

"Go, sterilize the fertile with thy rage, Whole nations, to depopulate is thine."
Savage: Public Spirit.

2. To deprive of fecundity, or the power of producing young.

stēr-lēt, s. [Ger., from Russ. sterliad.]

Ichthy.: Acipenser ruthenus, from the Danube and Russian rivers flowing into the Black Sea. It is a small species, rarely exceeding three feet in length, but is highly prized as a food-fish. It has a narrow, elongated, pointed snout, barbels slightly fringed, skin of upper surface dark gray, dorsal shields and belly whitish. The sterlet is a regular article of food in Vienna, and sometimes ascends the Danube as far as Ulm.

stēr-līng (1), *star-ling, *ster-lyng, s. & a. [Prob. from esterling or esternling, from A. S. eāstan=from the east, or eāstern=eastern, and suff. -ling; so called after the Esterlings or North Germans (Hanse merchants), who were the first moneyers in England. In a statute of Edward I. we find "Denarius Angliæ, qui vocatur Sterlingus;" and in a charter of Henry III. the sterling is set down as a penny. Cotgrave gives "Esterlin, a penny sterling, our penny."]

A. As substantive:

Zoöl.: A genus of Chelydidae, with six species, from tropical and southern Africa and Madagascar. Head depressed, with great plates, jaws without dentilations, no nuchal plate; sternum wide, with narrow lateral prolongations; free anterior portion of plastron rounded and movable.

†stērn-ōx'-ī, †stērn-ōx'-ī-a, s. pl. [Pref. stern-, and Gr. oxys=sharp.]

Entomol.: A sub-tribe of Pentamerous Beetles. Presternum produced in front into a lobe, and behind into a spine received into a small cavity of the mesosternum. Families, Elateridæ and Buprestidæ.

stērn'-sōn, s. [STERN, s.]

Shipbuild.: A binding-piece above the deadwood in the stern, and practically forming an extension of the keelson, on which the sternpost is stepped.

†stērn'-ū-lā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from sterna (q. v.).]

Ornith.: A genus of Laridæ, founded by Boie for Sternula minuta (= Sterna minuta), the Little or Lesser Tern. [STERNA.]

stēr'-nūm, s. [Gr. sternon=the breast, the chest.]

Compar. Anat.: The breast bone. In man, the flat bone, occupying the front of the chest, and formed by the meeting of the visceral arches. It is flattened from before backward, and presents a slight vertical curve with the convexity in front. It is divided into the manubrium or presternum, the mesosternum, and the ensiform or xiphoid process or metasternum. All mammals and birds possess a sternum, and the presence or absence of a keel on that bone in birds is used as a means of classification. Fishes, Amphibians, and Ophidians have no sternum, and in Saurians the broad portion is generally expanded. Some suppose that the plastron of the Chelonia is a highly-developed sternum; others hold that it is a mere integumentary ossification. The name sternum is also given to the plate on each segment of the breast of a crustacean and an arachnid, but these are integumentary, and have no relation to a true sternum.

stēr-nū-tā'-tion, subst. [Lat. sternutatio, from sternuto, frequent. of sternuo=to sneeze.] The act of sneezing.

"A disease wherein sternutation proved mortal, and such as sneezed died."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. ix.

stēr-nū-tā-tīve, a. [Fr. sternutatif.] Having the quality of provoking to sneeze.

stēr-nū-tā-tōr'-ŷ, a. & s. [Fr. sternutatoire, from Lat. sternuto=to sneeze.]

A. As adj.: Having the quality of exciting to sneeze; sternutative; as snuff, sub sulphate of mercury, &c. [ERRHINE.]

B. As subst.: A substance which provokes sneezing. The most familiar sternutatories are snuffs of various kinds.

"Physicians, in persons near death, use sternutatories, or such medicines as provoke unto sneezing."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. ix.

stēr'-nū-tōr'-ŷ, s. [Lat. sternuto=to sneeze.] The same as STERNUTATORY, B. (q. v.)

Stēr'-ō-pēs, s. [Gr. Steropēs=the Lightner, one of the three Cyclopes.]

stēt, phr. [Lat.=let it stand.]

Print.: A word written in the margin of a proof, directing attention to a portion of the matter, and countermanding an order to expunge it. A series of dots made below the matter has the same effect. Often used as a verb; as, to stet a passage.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

stet processus, phr. [Latin=let the process stop.]

Law: An order from a court to stay proceedings.

stēt'-ē-fēldt-ite, s. [After Stetefeldt, who analyzed it; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An argentiferous copper ore, found in Nevada. Analyses of a similar ore from other localities are discordant. It is probably a mixture of antimony oxide with copper and other metallic oxides.

stēth'-al, s. [Eng. st(earic), and ethal.] [STETHYLIC-ALCOHOL.]

stēth-ōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. stēthos=the chest, and metron=a measure.]

Surg.: An instrument for measuring the external movement in the walls of the chest during respiration, as a means of diagnosis in thoracic disease. In one form a cord is extended round the chest, and its extension, as the thorax is expanded, works an index finger on a dial-plate. It thus becomes a measure of the expansive power and capacity of the lungs.

stēth'-ō-scōpe, s. [Gr. stēthos=the chest, and skopeō=to see, to observe.]

Med.: An instrument employed in auscultation (q.v.). It was invented by Laennec, who at first used a roll of blotting-paper for the purpose of concentrating and conveying sound to the ear; but, according to Tyndall (Sound, pp. 42, 43), the philosophy of the stethoscope was enunciated by Dr. Robert Hooke (1635-1702). The simplest form of stethoscope, and that most commonly employed, consists of a cylindrical stem of porous wood, as cedar or deal, some seven or eight inches long, expanding at one end into a circular, funnel-shaped aperture from two and a half to three inches in diameter, which is applied to the chest, while the other end terminates in a smaller aperture, which is placed in the ear of the physician. Flexible stethoscopes of rubber are also employed; these are sometimes furnished with two ear-tubes, so that the sounds may be perceived by both ears. The chief use of the stethoscope is to enable the medical man to sound small portions of lung at a time, and so detect more correctly than by the unaided ear the exact seat of disease.

stēth'-ō-scōpe, v. t. [STETHOSCOPE, s.] To examine with a stethoscope.

"You wish me to submit to be stethoscoped."—Savage; R. Medlicott, bk. i., ch. xxi.

stēth-ō-scōp'-ic, stēth-ō-scōp'-ic-al, a. [Eng. stethoscop(e); -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to a stethoscope; obtained or made by means of a stethoscope; as, a stethoscopic examination.

stēth-ō-scōp'-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. stethoscopical; -ly.] By means of a stethoscope.

stēth-ōs'-cō-pist, s. [Eng. stethoscop(e); -ist.] One who is skilled in the use of the stethoscope.

stēth-ōs'-cō-py, s. [Eng. stethoscop(e); -y.] The art of stethoscopic examination.

stēth-yl'-ic, a. [Eng. st(earic), and ethylic.] Derived from or containing cetyl alcohol.

stethylic-alcohol, s.

Chem.: $C_{18}H_{38}O=C_{18}H_{37}HO$. Stethal. The alcohol of the series, $C_nH_{2n+2}O$, corresponding to stearic acid. It occurs in spermaceti, together with ethal and methal, but has not yet been obtained in the separate state.

stēve, v. t. [From stevedore (q.v.).] To stow, as cotton or wool, in a ship's hold. (Local.)

stēv'-ē-dōre, s. [Sp. estivador=a packer of wool at shearing, from estivar=to stow, to lay up cargo in a ship's hold, to compress wool, from Lat. stipo=to crowd or press together. Cf. Sp. estiva; Fr. estive=the stowage of goods in a ship's hold; Port. estivar=to trim a ship; Ital. stivare=to press close.] One whose occupation is to stow goods, packages, &c., in a ship's hold; one who loads or unloads vessels.

stēv'-en, s. [A. S. stefn; Icel. stefna=the voice, a cry.]

1. A voice.
"So loude crieden they with mery steven."
Chaucer: C. T., 2,564.

2. A cry, an outcry, a clamor, noise.
"And had not Roffy renne to the steven, Lowder had been slain thilke same even."
Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar; Sept.

3. An appointment; an appointed place or time.
"Al day meteth men at unset steven."
Chaucer: C. T., 1,526.

stēv'-ī-a, s. [Named after Peter James Esteve, M. D., Prof. of Botany at Valencia.]

Bot.: A genus of Vernoniaceae akin to Ageratum. Pretty autumnal flowering plants from America, with purple, red, pink, white or violet flowers. About thirty-six species are cultivated in gardens, where they are sometimes used as border plants, but require the protection of a frame in severe weather.

stew (ew as ū), stuw-en, stuw-yn, stuyn, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. estuver (Fr. étuver)=to bathe, to stew, from estuve (Fr. étuve)=a stove, a hothouse, in pl. stews; O. H. Ger. stupa=a hot room for a bath; Sp. & Port. estufa=a stove, a hothouse; Ital. stufa.]

A. Trans.: To boil slowly or with a simmering heat; to cook or prepare, as meat or fruit, by putting it into cold water, and gradually bringing it to a low boiling point.

"Stew'd shrimps and Afrio cockles shall excite
A jaded drinker's languid appetite."

Francis: Horace; Satires iv. 2.

B. Intrans.: To be boiled or cooked in a slow, gentle manner, or in heat and moisture.

stew (ew as ū), (1), stewe, stue, stuwe, stuyve, stywe, s. [STEW, v.]

*1. A hot or warmed room, a house or place furnished with warm water or vapor baths; a bagnio, (Gower: C. A., viii.)

*2. A brothel; a house of prostitution. (Generally in the plural form, but frequently treated as a singular.)

"And here as in a tavern or a stews,
He and his wild associates spend their hours."

Ben Jonson: Every Man in his Humor, ii. 1.

*3. An early form of lock-hospital (q.v.).

"Thus, in the borough of Southwark, prior to the time sometimes fixed upon for the origin of syphilis, there were places called stews, where prostitutes were confined, and received the benefits of surgical assistance. They were taken up and put into these establishments, whether agreeable to them or not, by virtue of certain decrees, made expressly to protect the rest of the community from the risk of catching their complaints."—S. Cooper: Practice of Surgery (ed. 6th), p. 332.

*4. A prostitute. (In this sense also the plural form is frequently used as a singular.)

"Instead of that beauty he had a notorious stew, sent to him."—Sir A. Weldon: Court of King James, p. 146.

5. A dish that has been cooked by stewing; meat stewed.

6. A stew-pan (q.v.).

7. A breeding-place for tame pheasants.

¶ In a stew: In a state of agitation, confusion, trouble, or excitement.

"He, though naturally bold and stout,
In short was in a tremendous stew."

Barham: Ing. Legends; The Ghost.

stew-pan, subst. A cooking utensil for exposing meats to a prolonged gentle heat; usually in well-appointed kitchens a charcoal furnace or steam-bath.

stew-pot, s. A pot or vessel for stewing.

stew (ew as ū) (2), stewe, s. [Cf. Prov. Ger. stau=a dam, a pond.] A small pond where fish are kept for the table; a store-pond.

"This gentleman constructed carp stews."—Field, Oct. 3, 1885.

stew'-ard (ew as ū), stiv-ard, stiw-ard, stu-arde, s. [A. S. stiwæard, stiwæard for stigweard=a sty-ward, from stigo=a sty, and weard=a guardian, a warden, a keeper; Icel. stivardhr. The original sense was one who looked after the domestic animals, and gave them their food; hence, one who provides for his master's table, and, generally, one who superintends household affairs for another. (Skeat.)

*1. One who manages affairs for another.

"The first of them, that eldest was and best,
Of all the house had charge and government,
As guardian and steward of the rest."

Spenser: F. Q., I. x. 37.

2. A person employed on a large estate or establishment, or in a family of consequence and wealth, to manage the domestic affairs, superintend the other servants, collect rents, keep the accounts, &c.

"The consequence was that the steward was taken into custody and heavily fined."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

3. An officer in a college who provides food for the students, and superintends the affairs of the kitchen.

4. An official on a vessel, whose duty it is to distribute provisions to the officers and men. In passenger ships, a man who superintends the distribution of provisions and liquors, waits at table, &c.

5. A fiscal agent of certain bodies; as, the recording steward of a congregation of Methodists.

6. An English officer of state, as the Lord High Steward, the Steward of the Household, &c. The Lord High Steward was the greatest officer of state in England. The office was anciently the inheritance of the Earls of Leicester, till it was forfeited by Simon de Montfort to Henry III., at the end of whose reign it was abolished as a permanent office. A Lord High Steward is now only appointed for particular occasions, as a coronator or the trial of a peer. In the former case he has to arrange questions of precedence; in the latter to preside over the House of Lords. His office ceases with the business for which it was required. The Steward of the Household is an officer of the royal household, who presides over the court known as the Board of Green Cloth, which has the supervision of the household expenses and accounts, the purveyance of provisions, payment for them, &c. He appoints the royal tradesmen, and selects and has authority over all servants of the household, except those of the chamber, chapel, and stables.

7. In Scotland, an officer appointed by the sovereign over certain lands belonging to himself, having the same proper jurisdiction as a regality; also, the deputy of a lord of regality.

¶ Steward (or High Steward) of Scotland: An ancient chief officer of the crown, of the highest dignity and trust. He had not only the administration of the crown revenues, but the chief oversight of all the affairs of the household, and the privilege of the first place in the army, next to the king, in battle.

stew'-ard (ew as ū), v. t. [STEWARD, s.] To manage as a steward. (Fuller.)

stew'-ard-ess (ew as ū), s. [Eng. steward, s.; -ess.] A female steward; specifically, a woman who waits upon ladies in passenger ships, &c.

stew'-ard-ly (ew as ū), adv. [Eng. steward, s.; -ly.] Like a steward; with the care of a steward.

"To be stewardly dispensed, not wastefully spent."—Canon Tooker.

stew'-ard-ry (ew as ū), s. [Eng. steward, s.; -ry.] The work, office, post, or position of a steward; stewardship, superintendence.

stew'-ard-ship (ew as ū), s. [Eng. steward, s.; -ship.] The office, post, or position as a steward. (Shakesp.: Richard II., ii. 2.)

stēw'-art-ry (ew as ū), s. [Eng. steward, s.; -ry.]

*1. The office or post of a steward; stewardship.

"A human stewardry, or trust,
Of which account is to be giv'n, and just."

Byron: Poetical Version of a Letter.

2. Jurisdiction over a certain extent of territory, nearly the same as that of a regality; also, the territory over which this jurisdiction extends.

stew'-ish (ew as ū), a. [Eng. stew, s.; -ish.] Befitting a brothel; low, coarse, obscene.

"Rhymed in rules of stewish ribaldry."

Bp. Hall: Satires, i. 9.

sthām'-bā, s. [PALI.] A pillar. [Lat.]

sthēn'-ic, a. [Gr. sthenos=strength.]

Pathol.: Arising from accumulated excitability; used by the founder of the Brunnian system for the increased tone, vigor, or vitality which certain constitutions possess temporarily or permanently, and which creates in them a liability to a class of diseases not likely to affect an asthenic or feeble constitution. Thus, what looks like rude health, sometimes precedes and prepares the way for an attack of rheumatism. [BRUNNIAN-THEORY.] Cullen called it inflammatory diathesis.

sthēn'-ūr'-ūs, s. [Gr. sthenos=strength, and oura=the tail.]

Palæont.: A genus of Diprotodont Marsupials, allied to Dendrolagus, from the post-Tertiary deposits of Australia.

stī-a-cēi-a'-tō (cc as çh), s. [Ital.=crushed, flat; from stacciare=to crush; stacciata=a cake.]

Art.: A very low relief, adopted by sculptors for works which could be allowed little projection from the surface or base line. (Fairholt.)

stī'-an, stī'-an, sty-an-ye, s. [STR (2), s.] A humor in the eyelid; a sty.

stīb'-ble, s. [STUBBLE.] (Scotch.)

stibble-rig, s. The reaper in harvest who takes the lead. (Scotch.)

"Our stibble-rig was Rab M'Graen."

Burns: Halloween.

stīb'-blēr, subst. [Etym. doubtful.] A ludicrous designation for a clerical probation. (Scotch.)

stīb-borne, a. [STUBBORN.]

stīb'-ī-al, a. [Lat. stibi(um)=antimony; Eng. adj. suff. -al.] Like or having the qualities of antimony; antimonial.

"The former depend upon a corrupt incinerated melancholy, and the latter upon an adust stibial or eruginous sulphur."—Harvey.

stīb'-ī-al-ism, s. [Eng. stibial; -ism.] Antimonial intoxication or poisoning. (Dunghlison.)

stīb'-ī-an-ite, s. [Lat. stibi(um)=antimony, an connect., and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A doubtful species, resulting from the alteration of stibnite (q.v.).

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, thiis; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=f. -cian, -tian=shan. -tion, -sion=shün; -tion, -sion=zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious=shūs. -ble, -dle, &c.=bēl, dēl.

*stīb-i-ār'-i-an, s. [Lat. stibi(um)=antimony; Eng. suff. -arian. From the violent operation of antimony.] A violent man.

"This stibiarian presseth audaciously upon the royal throne, and, after some sacrifice, tendereth a bitter pill of sacrilege and cruelty; but, when the same was rejected because it was violent, then he presents his antimonial potion."—White. (Todd.)

stīb-i-āt-ēd, a. [Lat. stibium=antimony.] Impregnated with antimony.

stīb-īc, stīb-i-ōūs, a. [Lat. stibium=antimony; Eng. adj. suff. -ic, -ous.] Antimonic; antimonious.

stīb-i-cōn-īte, s. [Lat. stibium=antimony; Gr. konia=dust, and suff. -ite (Min.).] Antimony; Gr. konia=dust, and suff. -ite (Min.).

Min.: A massive compact mineral, occurring also in a pulverulent form. Hardness, 4-5.5; specific gravity, 5.28; luster, earthy; color, pale yellow to yellowish-white. An analysis yielded: Oxygen, 19.54; antimony, 75.83; water, 4.63=100, which gives the formula $SbO_4 + HO$. A species not as yet well defined.

stīb-īne', s. [Eng. stib(ium); -ine.]

1. Chem.: An antimony base, formed on the type of ammonia, NH_4 . Thus SbH_3 is stibine, $Sb(C_2H_5)_3$ is ethylstibine, &c. (Watts.)

2. Min.: [STIBNITE.]

stīb-i-ō-fēr'-rite, s. [Pref. stibio-, and Eng. fer-rite.]

Min.: An amorphous mineral found coating stibnite in Santa Clara County, California. Hardness, 4.0; specific gravity, 3.598; luster, somewhat resinous; color, yellow. An analysis yielded: Antimonic acid, 47.69; sesquioxide of iron, 35.36; water, 16.94=99.99.

stīb-i-ō-gā-lē'-nite, s. [Pref. stibio-, and Eng. galenite.]

Min.: The same as BINDHEIMITE (q. v.).

stīb-i-ō-hēx-ar-gēn'-tite, s. [Pref. stibio-; Gr. hex=six, and Eng. argentite.]

Min.: One of two native compounds of antimony and silver, the other being stibiotriargentite (q. v.). Composition: Antimony and silver, with formula Ag_3Sb_2 . Petersen considers that all analyses of dyscrasite (q. v.) indicate mixtures of these two compounds.

stīb-i-ō-trī-ar-gēn'-tite, s. [Prefs. stibio-, tri-, and Eng. argentite.]

Min.: A mineral consisting of antimony and silver, with formula Ag_3Sb_2 . [STIBIOHEXARGENTITE.]

stīb-i-ōūs, a. [STIBIC.]

stīb-i-ūm, s. [Lat.] [ANTIMONY.]

stīb-īte, s. [Lat. stib(ium), and Gr. lithos=a stone; Ger. stiblich.]

Min.: The same as STIBICONITE (q. v.).

stīb-nīte, stīb-īne', subst. [Lat. stibium=antimony; Fr. antimoine sulfuré; Ger. grauspiessglanz-zerz.]

Min.: The principal ore of antimony. Crystallization, orthorhombic; crystals being deeply striated longitudinally. Cleavage, prismatic, very distinct. Hardness, 2.0; specific gravity, 4.516; luster, metallic; color and streak, lead to steel-gray. Composition: Sulphur, 28.2; antimony, 71.8=100, which corresponds to the formula Sb_2S_3 . Occurs abundantly in many places, sometimes in beds, but more frequently in veins.

stīb-bō'-nī-ūm, s. [Eng. stib(ium), and (amm)o-nium.]

Chem.: An antimony-radicle formed on the type of ammonium, NH_4 . Thus $Sb(C_2H_5)_4$ is tetrethylstibonium. (Watts.)

stīc-ca'-dō, stīc-ca'-tō, s. [Ital.]

Music: An instrument composed of pieces of wood of graduated lengths, flat at the bottom and rounded at the top, resting on the edges of an open box, and tuned to a diatonic scale. The tone is produced by striking the pieces of wood with small hard balls at the end of a flexible stick.

stīch, s. [Gr. stichos=a row, a line, a verse.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A verse of whatever measure or number of feet.
2. A row or line of trees.

II. Hebrew Literature: One of the rhythmic lines which go to constitute the parallelism in the poetic books of Scripture. The books of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon are thus written in the oldest known Hebrew manuscripts, and poetical passages (like Exod. xv. 1-21) in the historic books are still so printed in the Hebrew Bible, whence they have been transferred to the English Revised Version. The arrangement is of great antiquity, and may have been introduced by the sacred writers themselves. Sometimes prose works are divided into stichs, consisting either of a certain number of words or clauses separated by their sense. It is believed that a stichometrical arrangement pervades the whole Vulgate, the prose as well as the poetic books; and Josephus considered that his works were composed of 60,000 stichs.

stī-chæ'-ūs, s. [Mod. Lat.] [STICH.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Blenniidae, with ten species, peculiar to the coasts near the Arctic circle, ranging southward to Japan, Norway, and Sweden. They are small fishes, and have the body elongate and covered with small scales, sometimes several lateral lines; dorsal fin of spines only.

*stīch'-īc, adj. [Eng. stich; -ic.] Pertaining or relating to lines or verses; consisting of lines or verses.

stīch-id'-i-ūm (pl. stīch-id'-i-a), s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. stichidion, dimin. from stichos=a row, a line.]

Botany (pl.): The pod-like processes containing tetraspores in some rose-spored algae.

stīch-ō-, pref. [STICH.] Having rod-like processes.

stīch-ō-chæ'-tā, s. [Pref. sticho-, and Gr. chaitē=long, flowing hair.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Oxytrichidae, with one species, Stichotricha pediculiformis; akin to Stichotricha (q. v.), but separated therefrom on account of its well-developed anal styles. Free swimming animals, from salt-water.

stīch'-ō-mān-qŷ, s. [Greek stichos=a line, a verse, and manteia=prophecy, divination.] Divination by lines or passages in books taken at hazard; bibliomancy.

stīch-ō-mēt'-rīc-al, a. [English stichometr(y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to stichometry; characterized by stichs or lines.

stīch-ōm'-ē-trŷ, s. [Gr. stichos=a row, a line, a verse, and metron=a measure.]

1. Measurement or length of books as ascertained by the number of verses contained in each book. [STICH, II.]

2. A division of the text of books into lines accommodated to the sense; a practice followed before punctuation was adopted. [GNOMOMETRY.]

stīch'-ō-mŷth, s. [Gr. stichomythia.]

Greek Plays: A conversation in alternate lines.

stīch-ōt'-rīch-a, s. [Pref. sticho-, and Gr. thrix (genit. trichos)=hair.]

Zoölology: A genus of Oxytrichidae, with five species from salt and fresh-water. Animalcules elongate, elastic and changeable in form, often excreting and inhabiting a mucilaginous or granular sheath, the anterior half of the body when protruded from this sheath usually twisted like a screw.

stick, *steke, *sticke, *stike, *styke (pa. t. *stak, *sticked, stuck, pa. par. *steken, *stiken, *stoke, *stoken, stuck), v. t. & i. [A. S. stecan, a strong verb (pa. t. stæc, pa. par. stecan, stocen); cogn. with Low Ger. steken=to pierce, stick (pa. t. stak, pa. par. steken); Ger. stechen=to sting, to pierce, stick, stab (pa. t. stach, pa. par. gestochen). Also A. S. stician, a weak verb (pa. t. sticode); cogn. with Dut. steken=to stick; Icel. stika=to drive piles; Dan. stikke=to stab; Sw. stikka=to stab, to sting, to prick; Ger. strecken=to stick, to set, to plant. Sting is a nasalized, and stitch a softened form of stick.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To pierce with a sharp instrument; to stab with a weapon.

"You were best stick her."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, i. 1.

2. To cause to pierce; to thrust in so as to pierce or wound.

"Thou stickest a dagger in me."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iii. 1.

*10. To scruple, to hesitate.

"Aristotle stuck not to affirm that the world neither began, nor yet shall end."—Swan: Speculum Mundi, ch. i., § 1.

*11. To cause difficulty, trouble, or embarrassment.

"This is the difficulty that sticks with the most reasonable of those who, from conscience, refuse to join with the revolution."—Swift.

† (1) To stick expresses more than to cleave; things are made to stick either by incision into the substance, or through the intervention of some glutinous matter; they are made to cleave by the intervention of some foreign body; what sticks, therefore, becomes so fast joined as to render the bodies inseparable; what cleaves is less tightly bound, and more easily separable. Two pieces of clay will stick together by the incorporation of the substance in the two parts; paper is made to stick to paper by means of glue; the tongue in a certain state will cleave to the roof. Stick is seldom employed in the moral sense, except in familiar and inelegant style; cleave is peculiarly proper in the moral acceptance.

(2) For the difference between to stick and to fix, see FIX.

† 1. To stick by:

(1) To adhere closely to; to be constant to; to support steadily.

"We are your only friends; stick by us, and we will stick by you."—Davenant.

* (2) To be troublesome by adhering.

"I am satisfied to trifle away my time, rather than let it stick by me."—Pope: Letters.

2. To stick out:

(1) To project; to be prominent.

"His bones that were not seen stick out."—Job xxxiii. 21.

(2) To hold out; to refuse to treat, surrender, or come to terms; as, They stuck out for a rise of wages.

3. To stick to:

(1) To adhere closely; to be constant to; to stick by.

(2) To be persevering in holding to, or in continuing at; to abide or continue firmly and steadily at.

"Two gentlemen, fishing at Aldermaston, stuck to it all day."—Field, Oct. 3, 1855.

4. To stick up:

stīg'-ma (pl. stīg'-mas; stīg'-ma-ta, in senses II. 1. 2. 4.), s. [Lat., from Gr. stigma=a mark.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A mark made with a red-hot iron; a brand impressed on slaves and others.

(2) A small red speck on the human skin, causing no elevation of the cuticle; a natural mark or spot on the skin.

2. Fig.: Any mark of infamy, disgrace, or reproach which attaches to a person on account of bad conduct; a slur.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: The projecting part of a Graafian follicle at which rupture occurs.

2. Biol. (pl.): The external openings of the tracheal apparatus in the Insecta and Arachnida. Applied also to the pores of the segmental organs of Leeches, and to the openings by which the pneumocyst communicates with the exterior in some of the Physophoridae. [SPIRACLE.]

3. Bot.: The part of the pistil to which the pollen is applied. It is generally situated at the upper extremity of the style. It is a glandular body, destitute of epidermis, and secretes a viscous material, which is most abundant at the period of fecundation. It is sometimes smooth, at others it may be covered with papillæ or with plumose hairs, or it may have around it an indusium. Morphologically viewed, the stigma is the apex of the carpellary leaf. When there is more than one style, each has a stigma; when there are several, they may coalesce so as to have various lobes or divisions. In most cases the stigma is thicker than the style. It varies greatly in form, and may be capitate, penicillate, plumose, or feathery, petaloid, peltate, filiform, or papillose. In some cases the stigma extends down the inner face of the style; it is then called unilaterial.

4. Eccles. (pl.): A term borrowed from Gal. vi. 17, "I bear in my body the marks (Gr. & Vulg. stigmata) of the Lord Jesus," and applied by ecclesiastical writers to the marks of stigmatization (q. v.). St. Paul probably took his metaphor from the fact that pagan soldiers sometimes branded the name of their general on some part of their body. (Lightfoot, in loc.) No writer of authority has ever maintained that the stigmata of St. Paul were anything more than the actual marks of suffering inflicted by his persecutors (Cor. ii. xi. 23-27).

"In a work on the subject Dr. Imbert-Gourbeyre enumerates 145 persons, twenty men, the rest women, who are stated to have received the stigmata."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 777.

stīg-māt'-īc-al-lŷ, adverb. [Eng. stigmatically; -ly.] With a stigma, or mark of shame or deformity.

"If you spy any man that hath a look,

Stigmatically drawn, like to a fury."

Wonder of a Kingdom. (1635.)

stīg-māt'-īck, a. & s. [STIGMATIC.]

stīg'-ma-tīst, s. [STIGMA.] One on whom stigmata, or the marks of Christ's wounds, are said to be supernaturally impressed.

stīg-ma-tī-zā'-tion, stīg-ma-tī-šā'-tion, subst. [Eng. stigmatiz(e); -ation.]

Eccles. & Church Hist.: The appearance or impression of counterparts of all or some of the wounds received by Jesus in His Passion, in their appropriate positions on the human body. The first case on record, and the most important is that of St. Francis of Assisi, the founder of the Franciscans. It is said that, while the saint was engaged in a fast of forty days on Mount Alvernus, in the year 1224, a crucified seraph with six wings appeared and discoursed to him of heavenly things. Francis fainted, and on recovering consciousness, found himself marked with the wounds of crucifixion in his hands, his feet, and right side. Thomas à Celana and St. Buonaventura attested the case, and Pope Alexander IV. (1254-1261) claimed to have seen the stigmata during the lifetime of St. Francis and after his death. A feast of the Stigmata of St. Francis is celebrated in the Roman Church on Sept. 17. The Dominicans claimed a similar distinction for a saint of their Order (St. Catherine of Siena, 1347-80), and the fact of her stigmatization is recorded in the fifth lection of the office of her feast (April 30) in the Roman Breviary. She is honored with a special feast in her own Order, though she is never represented in painting or sculpture with the stigmata. Since then many persons have claimed to have received these marks of divine favor. [See extract under STIGMATA, II. 4.] There is an excellent account of one of the latest cases—that of a Belgian peasant woman, Louise Lateau—in Macmillan's Magazine, April, 1871. Carpenter (Mental Physiol., ed. 4th, § 541) sees nothing either incredible or miraculous in these cases. "The subjects have been persons of strongly emotional temperament, who fell into a state of profound reverie, in which their minds were wholly engrossed by the contemplation of their Savior's sufferings, with an intense direction of their sympathetic attention to his several wounds; and the power which this state of mind would have on the local action of the corresponding parts of their own bodies gives a definite physiological rationale for what some persons accept as genuine miracles and others repudiate as the tricks of imposture."

stīg'-ma-tīze, stīg'-ma-tīše, v. t. [Fr. stigmatiser=to brand with a hot iron, to defame publicly, from Gr. stigmatizō=to mark or brand, from stigma (genit. stigmatos)=a mark, a prick, a brand, from stizō=to prick.]

1. Lit.: To brand; to mark with a brand or stigma.

"[They had more need some of them] have their cheeks stigmatized with a hot iron, I say, some of our Jesabells, instead of painting, if they were well served."—Burton: Anat. Melancholy, p. 470.

2. Fig.: To set a mark of disgrace on; to attach disgrace or infamy to; to brand, to reproach; to hold up to disgrace, reproach, and contempt.

"Stigmatized by the popular branch of the legislature as a teacher of doctrines so servile that they disgusted even Tories."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

stīl-āg-īn-ā'-çē-æ, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. stilago, genit. stilagin(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Antidesmads; an order of Diclinox Exogens, alliance Urteales. Trees or shrubs, with simple coriaceous alternate leaves, and twin deciduous stipules. Flowers minute, in axillary scaly spikes. Flowers unisexual, with a two, three, or five-parted calyx, and no corolla. Males, stamens two or more, arising from a tumid receptacle; females with a three or four-toothed sessile stigma, and a one or two-celled ovary, with the ovules suspended in pairs. Fruit drupaceous. Found in the East Indies and Madagascar. Known genera three, species about twenty. (Lindley.)

stīl-ā'-gō, s. [Latin stilus, stylus [STYLE], perhaps with reference to its length.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Stilaginaceæ (q. v.), not sufficiently distinct from Antidesma (q. v.). The shining, subacid fruit of Stilago buniis is eaten. The leaves are acid and diaphoretic; the young ones are boiled with potherbs, and given in India in syphilis.

stīl'-ar, a. [Eng. stil(e) (1), s.; -ar.] Pertaining or belonging to the stile of a dial.

"Laying a ruler to the center of the plane and to this mark, draw a line for the stilar line."—Moxon.

stīl-bā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin stilb(e); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Stilbids; an order of Perigynous Exogens, alliance Gentianales. Shrubs, with rigid, leathery, narrow leaves in whorls, articulated at the base, without stipules. Flowers in dense spikes at the point of the branches, sessile, each with three bracts at the base. Calyx tubular, campanulate, limb five-cleft, the segments equal, corolla monopetalous, the limb four, rarely five-parted, somewhat two-lipped; stamens as many as the divisions of the corolla, if five, then one abortive; ovary superior, with two cells, each with an erect ovule; fruit dry, indehiscent. All from the Cape of Good Hope. Genera three, species seven.

stīl'-ōā'-çē-ī, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. stilb(um); Lat. masc. pl. adj. suff. -acei.]

Bot.: An obsolete sub-order of Hyphomycetous Fungals, having a wart-shaped receptacle composed of conjoined filamentous or hexagonal cells and spores, borne singly on the apices of free filaments. They grow on decaying animal or vegetable matter, or on bark or leathery leaves.

stīl'-bē, s. [Gr. stilbē=a lamp, from stilbō=to glitter, to shine.]

Botany: The typical genus of Stilbaceæ (q. v.). Flowers in straight flowering spikes; corolla lobes narrow. Known species four, from the Cape.

stīl'-bēne, stīl'-bīn, s. [Gr. stilbē=luster, and Eng. ben(zen)e.]

Chemist.: $C_{14}H_{12}=C_6H_5\cdot CH\cdot CH\cdot C_6H_5$. Picramyl. Toluylene. Prepared by passing the vapor of toluene over heated plumbic oxide, or by the action of sodium on benzoic aldehyde. It crystallizes in thin, colorless plates, having a mother-of-pearl luster, is insoluble in water, soluble in boiling alcohol, melts at 115°, and boils at 306°. Heated with hydriodic acid, it is converted into dibenzyl.

stilbene-oxide, s.

Chem.: C_7H_6O . Laurent's name for oil of bitter almonds.

stilbene-peroxide, s. [STILBOUS-ACID.]

stīl'-bē'-sīc, adj. [Gr. stilbē=luster; s connect., and suff. -ic.] Derived from or containing stilbene.

stilbesic-acid, s.

Chemistry: $C_{28}H_{10}O_7(?)$. Obtained by passing chlorine gas into crude bitter-almond oil, pressing the product between paper, and washing with a mixture of ether and alcohol. It crystallizes in monoclinic prisms, is very slightly soluble in alcohol and ether, but soluble in alcoholic ammonia, and melts at 105°.

stīl'-bī-ā, s. [STILBUM.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Stilbidæ (q. v.).

stīl'-bīc, a. [Eng. stilb(ene); -ic.]

Chem.: A term sometimes used as a synonym of Benzoic (q. v.).

stīl'-bīd, s. [Mod. Lat. stilbe, and Greek eidos=form.]

Botany (pl.): Lindley's name for the Stilbaceæ (q. v.).

stīl'-bī-dæ, s. pl. [Modern Lat. stilb(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Noctuidæ. Thorax smooth; abdomen long, smooth; anterior wings narrow, in repose forming a very inclined roof. Larva smooth, with sixteen legs, feeding on grasses.

stīl'-bīl'-īc, a. [Eng. stilbyl; -ic.] [STILBOUS.]

stīl'-bīn, s. [STILBENE.]

stīl'-bīte, s. [Gr. stilbē=luster; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. An orthorhombic or monoclinic mineral belonging to the group of zeolites. Occurs commonly in sheaf-like bundles of crystals, divergent, also globular. Hardness, 3-5-4; specific gravity, 2.094-2.205; luster of cleavage face, pearly, of others vitreous; color, white, yellow, brown, red; transparent to translucent. Composition: Silica, 57.4; alumina, 16.5; lime, 8.9; water, 17.2=100, which corresponds to the formula $6SiO_2\cdot Al_2O_3\cdot CaO\cdot 6H_2O$. Mostly found in cavities in amygdaloidal basaltic rocks, but sometimes in metalliferous veins, also in fissures in granites and gneiss.

2. The same as HEULANDITE (q. v.).

stīl-boūs, a. [English stilb(ic); -ous.] Derived from or containing stilbic acid.

stilbous-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{15}H_{12}O_3(?)$. Stilbic acid. A compound formed by treating bitter almond oil with fuming sulphuric acid. It crystallizes from ether in monoclinic prisms, from alcohol in trimetric prisms, is insoluble in ammonia, and melts at 360°. When boiled in caustic potash, it is resolved into benzoic acid and benzoic hydride.

stīl'-būm, s. [Gr. stilbos=glittering.]

1. Bot.: The typical genus of Stilbacei. Receptacle stalked at the base, capitate or clavate at the summit. Various mildeu-like fungals, often brightly colored, on decaying wood, herbs, &c.

2. Entom.: A genus of Chrysididæ (q. v.). Stilbum splendidum is more than half an inch long, blue or emerald, often with the abdomen golden red. It occurs in the south of Europe, and in Asia and Africa.

stīl'-bŷl, s. [Eng. stilb(ene); -yl.]

Chem.: $C_{14}H_{11}$. The hypothetical radical of stilbene.

stile (1), s. [STYLE (1), s.] A pin set on the face of a sun-dial to form a shadow.

"Erect the stile perpendicularly over the sub-stilar line."—Moxon: Mechanical Exercises.

stīm'-u-lant, a. & s. [Lat. stimulans, pr. par. of stimulo=to stimulate (q. v.); Fr. stimulant.]

A. As adj.: Serving to stimulate; inciting, provocative; specif., in medicine, producing a quickly diffused and transient increase of vital energy and strength of action in the heart and arteries.

"The solution of copper in the nitrous acid is the most acrid and stimulant of any with which we are acquainted."
—Falconer.

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: Anything which stimulates, incites, or provokes; a stimulus, a spur.

"The frivolous and dissolute who remained required every year stronger and stronger stimulants."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

2. Pharmacy (pl.): Agents which increase vital action, first in the organ to which they are applied, and next in the system generally. Stimulants are of three kinds, stomachic, vascular, and spinal. The name is popularly restricted to the first of these, which act upon the stomach, expelling flatulence, besides allaying pain and spasm of the intestines. They are also called carminatives. Examples, ginger, capsicum and chillies, cardamoms, mustard, pepper, nutmeg, &c. Some vascular stimulants act on the heart and the larger vessels, others on the smaller ones. Of the first are free ammonia, alcohol in the form of brandy or wine, camphor, aromatics, &c. Of the latter are acetate of ammonia, guaiacum, sassafras, &c. "It is exceedingly sanguinary in disposition and agile in its movements: it feeds principally on the rat, the water-vole, and the rabbit, which it pursues with unusual pertinacity and boldness, hence the name stoat, signifying bold, by which it is commonly known."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), viii. 526.

sto-ble, s. [STUBBLE.]

stōb'-wōrt, stüb'-wōrt, s. [English stüb, and wort.]

Bot.: Oxalis acetosella.

stō'-cāh, subst. [Ir. & Gael. stocach=a kitchen lounge.] An attendant, a horseboy, a hanger-on.

"He holdeth himself a gentleman, and scorneth to work, which he saith is the life of a peasant; but thenceforth becometh a horseboy or a stocah to some kern."—Spenser: State of Ireland.

stōc-cāde' (1), stōc-cā'-dō, stō-cā'-dā, subst. [French estocade; Sp. estocada; Ital. stoccata=a thrust with a weapon, from Fr. estoc; Sp. estoque; Ital. stocco=a truncheon, a short sword; Ger. stock=a stick, a staff, a stock (q. v.).] A thrust in fencing; a stab; a thrust with a rapier.

"Tut, sir; I could have told you more; in these times you stand on distance; your passes, stocados, and I know not what."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

stōc-cāde' (2), s. [STOCKADE, s.]

stōc-cāde', v. t. [STOCKADE, v.]

stō-chās'-tic, stō-chās'-tick, a. [Gr. stochastikos=conjectural, from stochazomai=to aim at a mark, to conjecture; stochos=a mark.] Conjectural; able to conjecture.

"Though he were no prophet, nor son of a prophet, yet in that faculty which comes nearest to him excelleth, i. e., the stochastick, wherein he was seldom mistaken as to future events, as well public as private."—Whitefoot: Life of Browne.

stōck (1), stocke, stok, stokke, s. & a. [A. S. stocc=a post, a trunk, from the same root as stick, v. (q. v.); cogn. with Dut. stok=a stick, a handle, stocks; O. Dut. stock; Icel. stokkr=a trunk, log, stocks; Dan. stok=a stick; Sw. stock=a beam, a log; O. H. Ger. stoch; Ger. stock, from gestochen, pa. par. of stechen=to stick.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The stem or main body of a tree or plant; the trunk.

"The bud of peach or rose,
Adorns, though differing in its kind,
The stock whereon it grows."

Cowper: To Rev. W. C. Unwin.

2. The stem in which a graft is inserted, and by which it is supported; also, the stem or tree which furnishes slips or cuttings.

"The scion over-ruleth the stock quite; and the stock is passive only, and giveth aliment, but no motion to the graft."—Bacon.

3. Something fixed and solid; a post, a block, a pillar.

4. Hence, something lifeless and senseless.

"Saying to a stock, thou art my father, and to a stone, thou hast brought me forth."—Jeremiah ii. 27.

5. A person who is as lifeless and senseless as a post or stock.

"While we admire
This virtue and this moral discipline,
Let's be no stoics, nor no stocks."

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, i. 1.

6. The principal supporting or holding part of anything; that part in which others are inserted, or to which they are attached for firm support or hold; specifically—

(1) Husbandry: The part of a plow or other implement to which the irons, draft, and handles are attached.

(2) That part of a firearm to which the barrel and lock are attached.

(3) Joinery:

(a) That arm of a bevel which is applied to the base or molding side.

(b) The brace which holds a bit for boring.

(c) The block which holds the plane-bit.

(4) Mach.: The handle which contains the screw-cutting die.

(5) Naut.: The cross-bar at the upper end of the shank of an anchor, which cants the anchor and turns a fluke down.

(6) The support or pillar of the block on which an anvil is fitted, or of the anvil itself.

(7) The wooden frame which supports the wheel and post of a spinning-wheel.

(8) (Pl.): [STOCKS, 1.]

7. The original race or line of a family; the progenitors of a family and their direct descendants.

"Say what stock he springs of."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, ii. 3.

¶ Used also in an analogous sense of the domesticated animals, &c.

"In the case of strongly-marked races of some other domesticated species, there is presumptive or even strong evidence that all are descended from a single wild stock."—Darwin: Origin of Species (ed. 6th), p. 13.

8. The property which a merchant, a trader, or a company has invested in any business, including merchandise, money, and credits; more especially the goods kept on hand by a commercial house for the supply of its customers.

9. Capital invested; as—

(1) A fund employed in the carrying on of some business or enterprise, and divided into shares held by individuals who collectively form a corporation; shares.

"In modern finance the term [Stock] is applied to an imaginary sum of money, almost invariably £100, on which interest is paid at a given rate in perpetuity. Hence, a person who buys Stock simply buys a right to receive the said interest; and this right he may sell again, but the principal sum is altogether imaginary, and cannot be claimed. Consols, Railway Stocks, and Stocks in Commercial Companies are examples. In the first of these, any amount of Stock can be purchased and held that does not involve fractions of a penny. In Railway Stocks the limit more commonly stands at one shilling or one pound. In this respect Stock differs from bonds, debentures, shares, and obligations, which are invariably for round sums, as £10, £20, £50, £100, and so on; nevertheless, the term Stocks is currently used in a loose way to signify bonds, shares, and financial securities of any kind whatsoever."—Bithell: Counting-House Dictionary.

(2) A fund in England consisting of a capital debt due by Government to individual holders, who receive a fixed rate of interest on their shares; money funded in Government securities; as, the Three per Cent. Stocks.

"It was customary when money was borrowed for State purposes to record the transaction by means of notches on a stick (commonly hazel), and then to split the stick through the notches. The lender took one half as a proof of his claim against the Exchequer, and it was called his stock. The Exchequer kept the other half, which was called the counterstock. [COUNTERFOIL, 1.] In this way Stock came to be understood as money lent to the Government, and eventually to any public body whatever, and the different funds subscribed from time to time came to be called The Stocks."—Bithell: Counting-House Dictionary.

10. A supply provided; provision, store, fund, accumulation.

"Till all my stock of infant sorrows spent,
I learn'd at last submission to my lot."

Cowper: My Mother's Picture.

11. That portion of a pack of cards which is not dealt out in certain games, but is allowed to remain on the table, and may be drawn from as occasion requires.

*12. A covering for the leg; a stocking.

"Our knit silke stockes and Spanish lether shoes."

Gascoigne: Steele Glas, 375.

13. A kind of stiff wide band or cravat worn round the neck.

14. Rags and material for making paper. Said also of other material used in business.

15. Liquor in which meat, bones, vegetables, &c., have been boiled, used as a foundation for soups and gravies.

*16. A counterstock [9 (2)].

II. Technically:

1. Agriculture:

(1) The collective animals used or reared on a farm; called also Live stock.

"The facilities he has for making ready disposal of surplus stock."—Field, Jan. 23, 1886.

(2) The implements of husbandry and produce stored for use; called also Dead stock.

2. Bot. & Hort.: An abbreviation of Stock Gillyflower, Matthiola incana, extended in botanical works to the genus Matthiola under which article the wild species are described. Various species have furnished the garden stocks, which have run into varieties and sub-varieties, some of them probably hybrids. All the garden varieties of the Brompton or Simple-stemmed Stock and of Queen's Stock have been derived from M. incana; those of Ten-weeks' Stock, from M. annua, and the Smooth-leaved annual stocks from M. græca. The Wall-flower-leaved Stock, M. tristis, a small plant, with narrow hoary leaves and dingy brown flowers, growing in the south of Europe, is the Night-scented Stock, which is cultivated in greenhouses for its fragrance by night, as are M. livida and M. odoratissima, &c. M. fenestralis is the Window-stock. [GILLYFLOWER, MATTHIOLA, VIRGINIA-STOCK.]

3. Building: Red and gray bricks used in part-colored brickwork.

4. Fulling: The beater of a fulling-mill.

5. Shipbuild.: The frame which supports a vessel and its cradle while building.

6. Timber: Lumber of regular market size. [STOCK-GANG.]

B. As adj.: Kept in stock; kept on hand ready for service; habitually used, standing, permanent.

"Anything was thought good enough for the staging of a stock piece."—London Globe.

¶ (1) Stock and die: The screw-cutting die in its holder.

(2) Stock and fluke: The entire being or composition of anything; as, They went over stock and fluke. (Imagery borrowed from an anchor.)

(3) Stock-and-stone worship:

Comp. Religions: A term embracing all forms of worship offered directly or indirectly to stocks and stones; i. e., whether they are considered as fetishes, or as mere ideal representatives of deities.

"The frequent stock-and-stone worship of modern India belongs especially to races non-Hindu or part-Hindu in race and culture. Among such may serve as examples the bamboo which stands for the Bodo goddess Mainow, and for her receives the annual hog, and the monthly eggs offered by the women; the stone under the great cotton-tree of every Khond village, shrine of Nadzu Pennu, the village deity," &c.—Tylor: Primitive Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 163.

(4) Stock in trade: The goods kept for sale by a shopkeeper; the tools and appliances of a workman; hence, figuratively, a person's resources or capabilities.

(5) To take stock: To make an inventory of goods on hand; hence, fig., to make an estimate, to set a value; to examine or observe carefully for the purpose of forming an opinion.

stock-account, s.

Comm.: The account in a ledger, showing on one side the amount of the original stock with accumulations, and on the other the amount withdrawn.

Bot.: Geranium robertianum. (Britten & Holland.)

stock-blind, a. Blind as a stock; stone-blind.

"True lovers are blind, stock-blind."—Wycherley: Country Life, ii. 1.

stock-board, s.

1. Music: The board above the arrangement of register slides by which is regulated the access of air to the respective systems of pipes or reeds which form the stops of an organ. The stock-board is pierced with holes, in which set the lower ends, or feet of the pipes.

2. Brick-making: The board over which the brick-mold slips, and which forms the bottom of the latter while the brick is molding.

stock-breeder, s. One who devotes his attention to the breeding of live stock, or domestic animals, as horses or cattle.

stock-broker, s. A broker who deals in the purchase and sale of stocks as the agent of others.

stock-brush, s. A brush for whitening and dis-tempering. The tufts are on each side of a long head.

stock-certificate, s.

Law & Comm.: A certificate of title to certain stock or any part of it, with coupons annexed, entitling their bearer to the dividends on the stock.

stock-dove, s.

Ornith.: Columba ænas, a European species, more locally distributed, smaller in size, and darker in color than C. livia, the Wood-pigeon (q. v.), and with no white on the neck or wings. It is the Hohltaube or Hole-dove of the Germans.

"By Montagu, Bewick, Fleming, and some of the earlier authors the stock-dove was confounded with the Rock-dove [C. livia], from which, however, it is now well known to be perfectly distinct. Whilst this confusion lasted, the name was supposed to be owing to its being considered to be the origin of our domestic stock; but the appellation is now generally attributed to its habit of nesting in the stocks of trees, particularly such as have been headed down, and have become rugged and bushy at the top."—Yarrell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), iii. 9.

1. The building, place, or mart where stocks or shares are bought and sold.

2. An institution composed of an association of brokers and capitalists organized under a code of laws for the especial purpose of buying and selling stocks and bonds of corporations. Such corporations are not allowed to have their securities listed until the rules provided for such purposes have been complied with.

¶ The principal exchanges in this country are the following: New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Boston. That of Philadelphia is the oldest, having been organized about the beginning of the present stock-shears, s. pl. Shears used in shearing cloth.

stock-sleeve, s. A truncated or half-sleeve.

stock-station, s. A station or district where stock is raised. (Austr.) stock-still, a. Still as a fixed post; perfectly still; motionless.

"Our preachers stand stock-still in the pulpit, and will not so much as move a finger to set off the best sermon."—Addison.

stock-stone, s. A rubbing-tool used by curriers on the grain side of leather to stretch and straighten it before currying.

stock-tackle, s.

Naut.: A tackle applied to the stock of an anchor, when fished, to rouse it perpendicular.

stock-taking, subst. A periodical examination, inventory, and valuation of the stock in a shop, warehouse, or other business premises.

stock-trail, s. A term applied to gun-carriages which have a stock between the cheeks supporting the gun. The trail at the end of the stock rests upon the ground when the gun is in position for firing. When limbered up, a loop on the extremity of the trail is passed over the pintle-hook of the limber.

stock-work, s.

Mining: A method of working ore where, instead of lying in veins or strata, it is found in solid masses, so that it is worked in chambers and stories.

stock-yard, s. An inclosure for cattle on the way to or at market.

¶ With the development of the Central and Western States of the Union there arose a necessity for central markets for the disposition and distribution of the enormous livestock production of these regions. To meet such a demand there were established at convenient points, at the convergence of the great lines of railway, immense stock-yards. By this term is not to be understood merely inclosures into which live stock can be driven and herded, but all the buildings and conveniences necessary for the shipping, to all parts of the world, of the animals there collected, either "on the hoof," or in the various forms in which their slaughtered carcasses are known to commerce. During the earlier years of this particular branch of domestic enterprise the centers of the business were unsettled, and we find various cities throughout the great cattle-raising regions disputing for supremacy in the amount of business done. Great stock-yards were established, and still exist, in Cincinnati, Indianapolis, East St. Louis, Kansas City, Chicago, and other western, central, and northwestern points. Owing to the preternatural growth of Chicago, not many years elapsed before that city had outstripped all competitors and at the present time she is (and must be, for many years, if not for all time) the greatest stock-yard center on earth. Besides the great establishments of the West and Northwest there are like institutions of minor importance distributed throughout other portions of the Union. As Chicago is the leading stock-yard center, brief outline is given of the establishment there maintained: The Union Stock-yards Market at Chicago is, beyond doubt, the most thoroughly reliable market for the stock-raiser and the shipper of live stock in the world. To establish this market, with all of its unequalled facilities, cost millions of dollars, and, as a result of this great expenditure, no other place affords the accommodations which can be had at this point. One yardage charge, covering the entire time stock remains on sale, and the charge for feed made against the stock by this company, are all the charges which are made. From these sources comes the revenue required to cover all expenses pertaining to the Stock-yards—such as construction, repairs, cost of hay, corn, oats, weighing of live stock, lake-water system, taxes, fuel, gas, electric lights, tools, lost stock, yard cleaning, labor of 1,000 employees; current expenses, such as attorney's fees, insurance, books, stationery, printing, salaries of officers, agents and clerical force, and of the police and fire departments; interest on bonds and capital invested, all of which expenditures are incurred for the maintenance of this market, and accrue to the direct benefit of its patrons and the shippers of live stock. A regular cash deposit fund of $300,000 is also furnished to the National Live Stock Bank of the Union Stock-yards, to insure the payment of live stock shippers' freight expense bills. To this establishment are shipped every year more than 200,000 carloads of animals for slaughter and sale, and the total numbers of the cattle thus brought together will average from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 head. [ABATTOIR.]

stöck (2), s. [STOCKADE.]

1. A thrust with a rapier.

"To see thee pass thy puneto, thy stock, thy reverse."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 3.

2. A long rapier.

stöck, v. t. & i. [STOCK (1), s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To lay up in store; to accumulate or put by for future use.

2. To supply, provide, or furnish with stock; to fill, to supply.

"Did he make a bad world, and stock it with bad inhabitants?"—Gilpin: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 13.

*3. To put into the stocks.

"Who stock'd my servant?"—Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 4.

4. To attach to or supply with a stock, handle, or the like; as, to stock an anchor.

5. To put into a pack; as, to stock cards.

6. To suffer, as cows, to retain their milk for twenty-four hours or more previous to being sold.

7. To sow land with a certain crop or seed; as, to stock with wheat.

B. Intrans.: To take in, provide, or procure supplies.

"They stock heavily and expensively for the festive season, and the weather being close and wet, the meat keeps badly."—London Daily Telegraph.

¶ To stock up: To root or dig up; to extirpate.

"The wild boar not only spoils her branches, but stocks up her roots."—Decay of Piety.

stöck-åde', *stöc-cåde', s. [From Eng. stock (1), s., in imitation of stoccade (q. v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: An inclosure or pen made with posts and stakes.

II. Technically:

1. Civil Engin.: A row of piles, or a series of rows with brushwood in the intervals, driven into a sea/ or river shore, to prevent the erosion of the banks.

2. Fort.: Stout timbers planted in the ground so as to touch each other, and loop-holed for musketry.

In its most effective form it is eight or nine feet high, has a ditch in front, and a banquet in the rear. As appears from Elton's history (and from the still surviving customs of savage races), the driving of timber into the ground was an early form of fortification. The illustration shows a native stockade at Donoobow, in Burmah. It was composed of solid teak beams (c), from fifteen to seventeen feet high. Behind this wooden wall, the old brick ramparts (A) of the place rose to a considerable height, connected with the front defenses by means of cross beams (B), which afforded a firm and elevated footing to the defenders. A ditch (D) of considerable magnitude surrounded the defenses, the passage of which was rendered more difficult by spikes, nails, bolts, and other contrivances. Outside the ditch were several rows of strong railing (E), and in front of all an abattis (F), thirty yards broad, reaching down to the river Irrawaddy (G).

Stockade.

stöck-åde', v. t. [STOCKADE, s.] To surround, fortify, or protect with a stockade.

"The dacoits are reported to be strongly stockaded at Montshobo."—London Daily Telegraph.

One who is the holder or proprietor of stock in the public funds, or in the funds of a bank or other public company.

stöck-i-nēt', s. [STOCKING.]

Fabric: An elastic material used for dresses, jackets, &c.

"The tall gentleman in the stockinet pantaloons."—Th. Hook: The Sutherlands.

stöck'-līg, s. [From stock (1), s., in the sense of stump or trunk. The clothing of the legs and lower part of the body formerly consisted of a single garment, called hose, in French chausses. It was afterward cut in two at the knees, leaving two pieces of dress, viz., knee-breeches, or, as they were then called, upper-stocks, or in French haut de chausses, and the nether-stocks, or stockings, in French bas de chausses, and then simply bas. In these terms the element stock is to be understood in the sense of stump or trunk, the part of the body left when the limbs are cut off. In the same way Ger. strumpf = a stocking, properly signifies a stump. (Wedgwood.)]

1. A close-fitting knit or woven covering for the foot and leg. They are made of wool, cotton, or silk.

"The first person that wore stockings in England is said to have been Queen Elizabeth. She received them as a present from the Spanish ambassador."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. i., ch. ii.

2. An elastic bandage used as a support, and to remedy varicose veins, injuries to the tendons, &c. occurring in the human leg. A coarser and stronger kind is used in veterinary surgery.

stōck'-īsh, a. [Eng. stock (1), s.; -ish.] Like a stock or block; stupid, blockish.

"Since nought so stockish, hard, and full of rage,
But music for the time doth change his nature."
Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, v. 1.

stōck'-lēss, a. [Eng. stock (1), s.; -less.] Having no stock; without a stock.

"He fired off his stockless gun and brandished his sword dreadfully."—St. James's Gazette, Jan. 14, 1886.

stocks, s. pl. [STOCK (1), s.]

1. Ord. Lang.: An apparatus formerly used for the punishment of petty offenders, such as vagrants, trespassers, and the like. It consisted of a frame of timber, with holes, in which the ankles, and sometimes the ankles and wrists, of the offenders were confined.

"Fetch forth the stocks;
As I have life and honor, there shall he sit till noon."
Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Farriery, &c.: A frame in which refractory animals are held for shoeing or veterinary purposes.

2. Finance: [STOCK (1), s., A. I. 9. (2).]

3. Shipwright.: A frame of blocks and shores on which a vessel is built. It declines down toward the water, and is usually a timber frame, which, as the building proceeds, assumes the form of a cradle. The cradle rests on ways, on which it eventually slides when the vessel is launched. The vessel is laterally supported by shores; the cradle is held by struts and chocks. In launching, the shores are removed, so that the vessel rests altogether in the cradle; the ways are greased or soaped; the struts are knocked away; the chocks knocked out, and the ship slides down the ways into the water, where the cradle becomes detached and floats away.

¶ On (or upon) the stocks: In preparation; in course of preparation or manufacture.

"Mr. Dryden has something of this nature upon the stocks."—T. Browne: Works, iv. 42.

stōck'-y, a. [Eng. stock (1), s.; -y.]

stō-chī-ōl'-ō-gy, s. [STOICHOLOGY.] stō-gy, a. Coarse, heavy, rough. Used also substantively for stogy-shoe and stogy-cigar.

stō-ic, stō-ick, s. & a. [Lat. Stoicus, from Gr. Stōikos= (1) belonging to a colonnade, (2) stoic, because Zeno taught under a colonnade at Athens, named the Stoa Poikile; stoa=a colonnade, a portico.] [STOA.]

A. As substantive:

1. Lit. & Philos. (pl.): The adherents of a system of philosophy derived from that of the Cynics by Zeno (born at Citium in Cyprus about the middle of the fourth century B. C.). Zeno was the son of a merchant, and being reduced to poverty by the loss of a cargo of Phœnician purple which he was taking to Athens, he embraced the doctrine of the Cynics, and became for awhile the disciple of Crates. But he disliked the gross manner of the Cynics, and chose Stilpo of Megara [MEGARIC] for his next instructor; then, still unsatisfied, he turned his attention to the Platonic philosophy. After twenty years of laborious study he became a teacher himself, and opened his school in the Stoa at Athens, whence his followers derived their name. Though it had its origin in Greece, the Stoical philosophy was Roman in spirit; and, after giving way to other systems in its native land, it exercised great influence in Italy, and among the Roman Stoics are to be mentioned Cato the Younger († 46

A. D.; cf. Lucan: Phar., ii. 380-91), Seneca (B. C. 6-65 A. D.), Epictetus (60-140 A. D.), and the Emperor Marcus Aurelius (120-180). Stoical philosophy recognized one Supreme Moral Governor of the Universe (who, according to Epictetus, is the Father of all men), and a number of inferior deities. They taught that man alone had a rational soul, and that though he has a body like the lower animals, he has reason and intelligence like the gods, and that all his other faculties should be brought into subjection to reason. Hence, all that interfered with a purely intellectual existence was to be eliminated as dangerous. The pleasures and pains of the body were to be despised, for the pleasures and pains of the intellect were alone worthy to occupy man, allied to the gods by the possession of reason. It therefore became the duty of man to subdue his passions and senses, so that he might be free and virtuous.

"The Stoics, in their dread of becoming effeminate, became marble. They despised pain; they despised death. To be above pain was thought manly. They did not see that, in this respect, instead of being above humanity, they sank below it. . . . You receive a blow, and you do not wince? So much of heroism is displayed by a stone. You are face to face with Death, and you have no regrets? Then you are unworthy of life. Real heroism feels the pain it conquers, and loves the life it surrenders in a noble cause."—G. H. Lewes: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), i. 364.

2. Fig.: A person not easily excited, moved, or disturbed; one who is, or pre-tends to be, indifferent to pleasure or pain.

B. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to the Stoics or their teaching.

"The Stoic sect was founded by Zeno."—Carter: Epic-tetus. (Introd.)

2. Apathetic, stoical.

"Full many a stoic eye and aspect stern Mask hearts where grief hath little left to learn."
Byron: Corsair, iii. 21.

stō-ic-al, a. [Eng. stoic; -al.]

1. Lit.: Of or pertaining to the Stoics or their teaching.

2. Fig.: Not affected by passion; able completely to repress feeling; manifesting or characterized by real or pretended indifference to pain or pleasure.

"The condemned men [faced death with stoical courage."—London Times.

stō-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. stoical; -ly.] In a stoical manner; like a stoic; with real or assumed indifference to pleasure or pain.

"Be not stoically mistaken in the quality of sins."—Browne: Christian Morals, bk. iii., ch. xii.

stō-ic-al-nēss, s. [Eng. stoical; -ness.] The quality or state of being stoical; stoicism.

stōi-chī-ōl'-ō-gy, s. [Gr. stoichos=a row; suff. -ology.]

Science: The doctrine of elements, whether material or mental.

"Such also was the stoichiology connected with this reduction [of the ideas to numbers], or the doctrine of the singular or limiting element, of the undetermined element determinable by the former, and of the third element resulting from the mixture of the first two—the three constituting the elements of all that exists."—Ueberweg: Hist. Philos. (Eng. ed.), i. 117.

stōi-chī-ō-mēt'-ric-al, a. [Eng. stoichiometr(y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to stoichiometry.

stōi-chī-ōm'-ē-try, s. [Gr. stoichos=a row, and metron=a measure.]

Chem.: The law of chemical combination in definite proportions, and its application to chemical calculations. (Watts.)

stō-ī-çism, s. [Eng. stoic; -ism.]

1. The opinions, teachings, or maxims of the Stoics.

"As a reaction against effeminacy, stoicism may be applauded; as a doctrine it is one-sided. It ends in apathy and egotism."—G. H. Lewes: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), i. 364.

2. The quality or state of being stoical; real or assumed indifference to pleasure or pain.

"William so far forgot his wonted stoicism as to utter a passionate exclamation at the way in which the English regiments had been sacrificed."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

stō-ic'-i-ty, s. [Eng. stoic; -ity.] Stoicalness, stoicism.

"Leave this stoicity alone, till thou makest sermons."—Ben Jonson: Silent Woman, i. 1.

stōit, stōit'-ēr, v. i. [Etym. doubtful; cf. Sw. stoeta to dash one thing against another.] To walk in a staggering manner; to totter; to stumble on an object. (Scotch.)

"I wish ye had seen him stotting about, off ae leg on to the other."—Scott: Heart of Mid-Lothian, ch. xxx.

stōke, stōck, pref. & suff. [See def.] Used in place-names as a prefix and suffix, with the meanings of (1) place, from A. S. stoc=a place; as, Woodstock; A. S. wude stoc=a woody place; Bishopstoke

=the bishop's place or seat; (2) a stock, a stick, a trunk, from A. S. stoc, stocce=a stock (q. v.), as in Stockwood, Stockton, &c., being thus equivalent to a place stockaded.

stoke (1), stokke, v. t. [O. Fr. estoquer.] To stab.

"What for ire & tene, and alle in euelle wille, Scho stoked kyng Steuen, & ther did scho ille."
Robert de Brunne, p. 121.

stōke (2), v. t. & i. [Formed from stoker (q. v.).]

A. Trans.: To poke, stir up, supply a fire with fuel, and attend to it generally. (Spoken generally of large furnaces, steam-engines, or the like.) (Eng.)

B. Intrans.: To act as a stoker. (Eng.) stoke-hole, s.

1. Furnace:

(1) The place beneath the level of a boiler or oven where the furnace fire is fed or tended. (Eng.)

(2) The hole in a furnace at which the poker, stirrer, rabble, paddle, or other tool is introduced to stir the charge, as in puddling, calcining, or refining. (Eng.)

2. Naut.: A scuttle in a steamer's deck for the admission of fuel. (Eng.)

stōk'-ēr, stōak'-ēr, s. [Dut. stoker=a kindler or setter on fire, from stock=to make or kindle a fire; stock=a stick, a stock (q. v.).]

1. One who feeds and attends to a furnace or large fire, especially one employed to feed and tend the furnace of a locomotive or marine engine. (Eng.)

*2. A poker. (Eng.)

stōk'-in, stōk'-en, s. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps from Stoke, in Herefordshire.] A kind of apple.

stō'-lā, s. [Latin, from Gr. stōlē=equipment, a robe, a stole; stēllō=to equip.]

Roman Antiq.: A loose garment worn by Roman matrons over the tunic. To the bottom of it a border or flounce was sewed, the whole reaching down so low as to conceal the ankles and part of the feet. It was the characteristic dress of the Roman matron, as the toga was of the men; divorced women or courtesans were not allowed to wear it. It was usually gathered and confined at the waist by a girdle, and frequently ornamented at the throat by a colored border. It had either short or long sleeves, and was fastened over the shoulder by a fibula.

stōle, pret. of v. [STEAL.]

stōle (1), s. [A. S., from Lat. stola=a stola (q. v.).]

*1. A garment resembling the Roman stola; a loose robe or garment worn by ladies, and reaching to the ankles or heels.

"The solemn feast of Ceres now was near,
When long white linen stoles
the matrons wear."
Dryden: Cinyras and Myrrha, 239.

*2. A dress or robe worn by men.

"And the fadir seide to his ser-uantis, swithe brynge ye forth the first stole; and clothe ye hym."
Wycliffe: Luke xv.

3. A narrow band of silk or stuff, sometimes enriched with embroidery and jewels, worn on the left shoulder of deacons, and across both shoulders of bishops and priests, pendant on each side nearly to the ground. It was used in the administration of the sacraments and all other sacred functions.

†4. A surplice, a cotta.

"Six little singing-boys—dear little souls!
In nice clean faces, and nice white stoles."
Barham: Ing. Leg.; Jackdaw of Rheims.

5. A band of trimming for ladies' dresses and mantles.

"Between the lines of passementerie in front is a wide stole of blue fox, grebe, or chinchilla."—London Daily News.

*6. A dress, a covering.

"When mild morn in saffron stole First issues from her eastern goal."
Warton: Ode on Approach of Summer.

¶ Groom of the Stole: The first lord of the bed-chamber in the household of English sovereigns. His title is derived from the long robe (stola) worn by the sovereign on state occasions. (Brande.)

"Groom of the stole . . . is a great officer of the king's household, whose precinct is properly the king's bedchamber, where the lord chamberlain hath nothing to do."—Jacob: Law Dict.

stolen-goods, s. pl. Goods or any kinds of property which have been stolen.

stōl'-id, a. [Lat. stolidus=firm, stock-like; from same root as stand.] Dull, foolish, stupid, impassive.

stōl'-id-i-tŷ, s. [Fr. stolidité, from Lat. stoliditas, accusative of stoliditas, from stolidus=stolid (q.v.).] The quality or state of being stolid; dullness of intellect; stupidity, impassiveness.

"These are the fools in the text, indocile, untractable fools, whose stolidity can baffle all arguments."—Bentley: Sermons, ser. i.

stōl'-id-lŷ, adv. [Eng. stolid; -ly.] In a stolid manner.

stōl'-id-nēss, s. [Eng. stolid; -ness.] Stolidity.

stō-lōn, stōle (2), s. [Lat. stolo (genit. stolonis) = a branch.]

1. Bot.: A shoot which proceeds from a stem above the ground, and then descends into it and takes root, as in Aster junceus. It is akin to a sucker, which, however, leaves the stem beneath and not above the ground.

2. Zoöl.: The name given to (1) any connecting process of protoplasm in the multilocular Foraminifera; (2) to the prolongation of the common tunic, forming a vascular canal, in the Social Ascidians; and (3) to any of the processes sent out by the coenosarc in some of the Actinozoa.

stō-lōn-if'-ēr-ōus, a. [Lat. stolo (genit. stolonis) = a branch, and fero=to bear.]

Bot.: Producing or putting forth stolons. Sometimes used more loosely for producing or putting forth suckers. [STOLON.]

stōl'-pēn-ite, s. [After Stolpen, Saxony, where it occurs; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A clay found in the basalt of Stolpen.

stōlz'-ite, (z as tz), s. [After Dr. Stolz, of Tep-litz; suff. -ite (Min.).; Ger. scheelbleispath, scheelbleierz, wolframbleierz, stolzit.]

Min.: A tetragonal mineral occurring mostly in octahedral forms. Hardness, 2.7-3; specific gravity, 7.87-8.13; luster, sub-adamantine; color, gray, brown, red. Composition: Tungstic acid, 51.0; oxide of lead, 49.0=100, which is equivalent to the formula, PbO, WO₃. Found with molybdate of lead, at Bleiberg, Carinthia, and a few other places.

stō-mā (pl. stō-mā-tā), stō-māte, stō-mā-ti-ūm (pl. stō-mā-ti-ā) (ti as shī), s. [Gr. stoma (genit. stomatos)=a mouth.]

1. Anat. (pl., generally of the form stomata): Openings in the lymphatic vessels in man; lymphatic orifices. Similar orifices have been found in the omentum of the lower mammals. Used also of the spiracles or breathing holes along the sides of insects.

2. Botany:

(1) The opening through which dehiscence takes place in the spore-cases of ferns.

(2) The ostiolum of certain fungals.

(3) (Pl.): Passages through the cuticle of a plant for the maintenance of respiration. They appear like an oval space, in the center of which is a slit that opens or closes according to circumstances, and lies above a cavity in the subjacent tissue. In some plants, including those with floating leaves, stomata are on the under, in others on the upper surface of the leaves; in leaves standing at right angles to the earth both sides have stomata. In succulent plants the stomata are few.

stō-māc'-ā-qē, s. [Lat., from Gr. stomakakē=scurvy of the gums.]

Pathol.: (1) An erosion of the gums, with spontaneous hæmorrhage, fetid breath, &c., symptomatic of scurvy; (2) scurvy (q.v.).

stōm'-ach, stōm'-ack, stom-acke, stom-ak, stom-ake, s. [Fr. estomac (O. Fr. estomach), from Lat. stomachum, accus. of stomachus=the gullet, the stomach, from Gr. stomachos=a mouth, an opening, the gullet, the stomach, from stoma=a mouth; Sp. & Port. stomaco.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 1.

(2) The throat, the gorge, the gullet.

*2. Figuratively:

(1) The desire for food caused by hunger; appetite.

"What is't that takes from thee thy stomach?"

Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., ii. 3.

(2) Inclination, liking.

(3) Courage.

"He who hath no stomach to this fight

Let him depart."—Shakesp.: Henry V., iv. 3.

(4) Violence of temper; anger, resentment.

"The winds grow high; so do your stomachs, lords."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., ii. 1.

(5) Sullenness, resentment, stubbornness, willful obstinacy. (Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.)

(6) Pride, haughtiness, arrogance.

"He was a man

Of an unbounded stomach, ever ranking

Himself with princes."

Shakesp.: Henry VIII., iv. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Compar. Anat.: A membranous sac, formed by a dilatation of the alimentary canal, in which food is received and subjected to the processes of digestion among the Vertebra. The human stomach is an elongated, curved pouch, from ten to twelve inches long, and four or five inches in diameter at its widest part, lying almost immediately below the diaphragm, nearly transversely across the upper and left portion of the abdominal cavity, and having the form of a bagpipe. It is very dilatable and contractile, and its average capacity is about five pints. The left and larger extremity is called the cardiac, great, or splenic extremity; the right and smaller, is known as the pyloric, from its proximity to the pylorus (q.v.). The food enters the stomach through the œsophagus by the cardia or cardiac orifice, and, after having been acted on by the gastric juice, is passed on in a semi-fluid or pulpy state through the pylorus into the small intestines. The stomach has four coats, named from without inwards: (1) the serous, (2) the muscular, (3) the areola or sub-mucous, and (4) the mucous coat. The last is a smooth, soft, rather thick and pulpy membrane, generally reddish in color from the blood in its capillary vessels; often ash-gray in old age. After death it becomes a dirty brown, and in acute inflammation, or from the action of strong acrid poisons, it becomes of a bright red, either continuously or in patches. Corrosive poisons also affect its coloration. The surface of the mucous membrane is beset with secreting glands. The stomach is supplied with blood from the cœliac artery, which gives off arterial branches that ramify freely, and the veins return the residual blood into the splenic and superior mesenteric veins, and directly into the portal vein. The lymphatics of the stomach are very numerous, and arise in the mucous membrane. The nerves are large, and consist of the terminal branches of the two pneumogastric nerves belonging to the cerebro-spinal system, and of off-sets from the sympathetic system derived from the solar plexus. Their ending has not been traced. Owing to recent improvements in electrical apparatus, the physiology and pathology of the human stomach in life is becoming much better known. Medical electricians have recently devised a plan by which the interior of the human stomach may be illuminated for examination. The patient is laid upon the operating table and a slender tube, carrying a glass bead upon its end, is introduced into the stomach. A small light inside the bead is supplied by fine wires running out through the tube and connected to a small battery. The interior of the stomach is plainly lighted and all its parts are brought into view by a small movable mirror at the end of the tube. In the lower mammals three forms of stomach have been distinguished: (1) Simple, consisting of a single cavity, as in man; (2) Complex, in which there are two or more compartments communicating with each other, as in the kangaroo, the porcupine, and the squirrel; and (3) Compound, in which the stomach is separated into a reservoir and a digestive portion. [RUMINATION.] The family Camelidæ have a stomach divided into two compartments by a muscular band—one of the points of difference between them and the other ruminants. The lining of the second stomach, or honeycomb bag, and of a portion of the first stomach, or paunch, is provided with a great number of cells in which water is stored up and long retained for use in time of drought and of long journeys over the desert. [CAMEL.] In birds there are three small but distinct dilatations of the alimentary canal [CROP, GIZZARD, PROVENTRICULUS], and in most reptiles the simplicity of the œsophagus extends to the stomach. In fishes, two forms are found, the siphonal stomach (q.v.) and the cœcal, in which the upper portion gives off a long blind sac. In the higher Invertebrata, there is a digestive tract with functions analogous to those of the stomach of Vertebrates; in the lower there may (Hydra) or may not (Amœba) be a gastric cavity in which food is ingested and absorbed. In the latter case the living protoplasm closes over its prey, and, after a time by a reversing process, the indigestible remains are ejected. To these tracts or cavities, the name stomach is often applied. [DIGESTION, II. 4.]

2. Pathol.: The human stomach is subject to ulceration, cancer, cadaveric softening, perforation, catarrh, &c.; besides which, chiefly through errors in food, and want of exercise on the part of the individual, it may fail in its proper function of digestion. [INDIGESTION.]

stomach-animals, s. pl.

Zoöl.: Oken's name for the Infusoria.

stomach-piece, s.

Shipbuild.: A compass-timber fayed to the stem and keel; an apron.

stomach-pump, s.

Surg.: A suction and force pump for withdrawing the contents of the stomach in cases of poisoning, &c., and also used as an injector. It resembles the ordinary syringe, except that it has two apertures near the end, in which the valve opens different ways, so as to constitute a sucking and a forcing passage.

stomach-qualmed, a. Sick at heart.

"Or stomach-qualmed at land, a dram of this Will drive away distemper."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iii. 4.

stomach-staggers, subst. A disease in horses, depending on a paralytic affection of the stomach. In this disease the animal dozes in the stable, and rests his head in the manger; he then wakes up and falls to eating, which he continues to do till the stomach swells to an enormous extent, and the animal at last dies of apoplexy or his stomach bursts.

stomach-timber, s. Food.

stōm'-ach, stōm'-ack, v. t. & i. [Latin stomachor=to be or become indignant. [STOMACH, s.]

A. Transitive:

*1. To resent; to remember with anger and resentment.

"Believe not all; or, if you must believe,

Stomach not all."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 4.

2. To bear without resenting or opposing; to put up with; to brook.

"English theatrical audiences, who will not stomach the uncompromising realism with which cotemporary French dramatists set forth the workings of the deadliest sins."—London Daily Telegraph.

*3. To encourage.

"When He had stomached them by the Holy Ghost."—Bale: Select Works, p. 313.

*B. Intrans.: To be angry; to show resentment.

"'Tis not a time for private stomaching."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 2.

stōm'-ach-al, a. [Fr. stomacal.] Stomachic, cordial.

stōm'-ached, a. [Eng. stomach; -ed.] Filled with resentment. (Chiefly in composition.)

stōne, *ston, *stoon, s. & a. [A. S. stán; cogn. with Dut. steen; Icel. steinn; Dan. & Sw. sten; Ger. stein; Goth. stains; Russ. stiena=a wall; Gr. stia=a stone, a pebble.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 1.

(2) The material obtained from rocks or stones; the kind of substance they produce.

(3) A gem; a precious stone.

"I thought I saw
Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl, Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels."
Shakesp. Richard III., i. 4.

(4) Something made of stone; as—

(a) A monument erected to preserve the memory of the dead; a gravestone.

"Underneath this stone doth lie
As much beauty as could die."

Ben Jonson: Epitaph on Queen Elizabeth.

* (b) A gun-flint.

(5) Something which resembles a stone; as—

(a) A calcareous concretion in the kidneys or bladder; hence, the disease arising from a calculus. [CALCULUS, 2.]

"Past earthquakes—ay, and gout and stone."
Tennyson: Lucretius, 153.

(b) The nut of a drupe or stone fruit; the hard covering enclosing the kernel, and itself enclosed by the pericarp; the hard and bony endocarp of a drupaceous fruit.

"Cracking the stones of the prunes."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, ii. 1.

(c) A testicle.

¶ In composition used by the old herbalists for an orchis, as dog-stones=dog-orchis (Orchis mascula).

(d) The glass of a mirror; a mirror.

"Lend me a looking-glass;

If that her breath will mist or stain the stone,
Why then she lives."
Shakesp.: Lear, v. 3.

* (6) A hailstone.

* (7) A thunderbolt.

"The gods throw stones of sulphur on me."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, v. 5.

(8) A measure of weight in use throughout the northwest and central countries of Europe, but varying much in different places. The English imperial standard stone is a weight of 14 lbs. avoirdupois, but there are stones of other weights for particular commodities; thus the stone of butcher's meat or fish is 8 lbs., of cheese 16 lbs., of hemp 32 lbs., of glass 5 lbs., &c.

2. Fig.: Used as the symbol of hardness, torpidity, or insensibility; as, He has a heart of stone.

II. Technically:

1. Petrol., Geol., Arch., &c.: Stone is not used as a technical term in either Petrology or Geology, though it enters into the composition of words in those sciences, as Portland-stone. By masons, builders, &c., it is continually used, and is specially contrasted with brick as material for the construction of edifices. "That portion of it," says Weale, "which is used for building purposes is a dense, coherent, brittle substance, sometimes of a granulated, at others of a laminated structure, these qualities varying according to its chemical constitution and the mode in which it has been deposited." The qualities which render a building stone valuable are strength to resist superincumbent pressure, durability, and a capability of being easily wrought. The chief building stones in use are granites of various colors, elvans, syenites, porphyries, sandstones, millstone grit, dolomite, marbles, the mountain limestone, and others. The art of working in stone is of great antiquity, the Egyptians being especially celebrated for their granite edifices, obelisks, sculptures, &c.

2. Print.: The same as IMPOSING-STONE (q. v.).

B. As adj.: Made of stone.

"Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage."

Lovelace: To Althea, from Prison.

¶ (1) Artificial stone: A concreted material used for many purposes, as making building blocks, flagstones, tiles, vases, statuary, sewer-pipes, &c. Many substances have been used for its production. That which has been used on the largest scale, and, until a comparatively recent period, exclusively, was cemented Roman, or, still better, Portland cement, which hardens after being mixed with water. Ordinary concrete and beton are of this class. Terra-cotta, employed for architectural ornaments, statuary, &c., is in the nature of a fine brick.

(2) Meteoric stone: [AEROLITE.]

(3) Philosopher's stone: [PHILOSOPHER'S STONE.]

(4) To leave no stone unturned: To use all available or practicable means to effect an object; to omit or spare no exertions.

"The Australians, at least in modern times, must be counted as stone-boilers."—Tylor: Early Hist. Mankind, (ed. 1878), p. 265.

stone-boiling, s.

Anthrop.: (See extract.)

"It is even likely that the art of boiling, as commonly known to us, may have been developed through this intermediate process, which I propose to call stone-boiling. There is a North American tribe, who received from their neighbors the Ojibwas, the name of Assinaboins, or 'stone-boilers,' from their mode of boiling their meat. . . . They dig a hole in the ground, take a piece of the animal's raw hide, and press it down with their hands close to the sides of the hole, which thus becomes a sort of pot or basin. This they fill with water, and they make a number of stones red-hot in a fire close by. The meat is put into the water and the stones dropped in till the meat is boiled."—Tylor: Early Hist. Mankind (ed. 1878), p. 263.

lathe. Articles of other shapes are molded. The articles are then stacked in the kiln, with pieces of well-sanded clay between them, to prevent their adhering. A slow fire dissipates the moisture, and the heat is then raised until the flame and ware have the same color. The glaze is then added by pouring twenty or thirty ladlefuls of common salt into the top of the kiln. This is volatilized by heat, becomes attached to the surface of the ware, and is decomposed, the muriatic acid flying off and leaving the soda behind it to form a fine, thin glaze on the ware, which resists ordinary acids."—Knight: Dict. Mechanics, s. v. Stone-ware.

stone-work, subst. Work consisting of stone; mason's work of stone.

"They make two walls with flat stones, and fill the space with earth, and so they continue the stone-work."—Mortimer.

stone-worship, s.

Compar. Religions: Divine honors paid to stones either as the embodiments or the representatives of deities. It is a part of stock-and-stone worship, dating from remote antiquity, and was once widely spread. Grote (Hist. Greece, iv. 132) notes that it existed among the ancient Greeks; Tacitus (Hist., ii. 3) describes a conical pillar which stood instead of an image to represent the Paphian Venus, and adds, "ratio in obscuro," and Isaiah lvii. 6 shows that it was not unknown among the Jews. It lingered on in France and Europe till the Early Middle Ages (Lubbock: Orig. Civil. (ed. 1882), p. 307), in Norway till the end of the eighteenth century (Nilsson: Primitive Inhabitants of Scandinavia, p. 241), and, according to Lord Roden (Progress of Reformation in Ireland, pp. 51-54), the islanders of Inniskea, off the coast of Mayo, worshiped a stone, and whenever a storm arose besought it to send a wreck on the coast. Tylor, coupling the fact that stone-worship survived to the Early Middle Ages in England and France with the circumstance that groups of standing stones are set up in India to represent deities, suggests "that menhirs, cromlechs, &c., may be idols, and circles and lines of idols, worshiped by remotely ancient dwellers in the land as representatives or embodiments of their gods." [STYLITE.]

"This stone-worship among the Hindus seems a survival of a rite belonging originally to a low civilization, probably a rite of the rude indigenes of the land."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 164.

stone's cast, stone's throw, s. The distance to which a stone can be thrown by the hand.

"The new building will be within a stone's throw of the Ringstrasse."—London Daily Telegraph.

stōne'-chăt, s. [Eng. stone, s., and chat (1), s.]

Ornithology: Saxicola rubicola. The color varies according to the season; in an adult male in summer the head, throat, and small coverts of the wings are black, the borders of each feather ruddy brown, white spots on the sides of the neck, on the wings above, and on the rump, under parts ruddy, wings brown, tail-feathers white at the base, on the other parts dark brown. The colors of the female are less bright, and the white spots on the sides of the neck are smaller. The Stonechat occurs all the year in temperate Europe, though many migrate southward for the winter. It is rather smaller than the robin, frequents furze-clad commons or heaths, where it perches upon stones, darting forth in pursuit of some insect, and then returning to the same spot. The nest is built in April of moss and grass, hair and feathers; eggs pale grayish blue, with some reddish-brown spots at the larger end. It occurs in India, Asia Minor, &c., as well as throughout Europe. Called also Stone-smith, Stone-smich, Stone-chatter, Stoneclink, and Moor-titling.

stōne'-crōp, s. [Eng. stone, s., and crop=a top, a bunch of flowers; so called because the typical species, Sedum acre, grows on stone walls, and has dense tufts of flowers. (Prior.)]

Bot.: Any species of the genus Sedum (q. v.), and specially the Common or Biting Stonecrop, Sedum acre.

¶ The Great Stonecrop is (1) Cotyledon umbilicus, and (2) Sedum album; the Shrub Stonecrop is Succeda frutescens.

stōne, stene*, v. t. [STONE, s.]

I. Literally:

1. To pelt, beat, or kill with stones.

"And the husbandman took his servants, and beat one and killed another, and stoned another."—Matthew xxi. 35.

2. To face or wall with stones; as, to stone a well.

3. To cover, spread, or repair with stones.

"Many of the orchards are more than a mile from the town, no stoned roads leading to them."—Field, Feb. 26, 1887.

4. To free from stones; as, to stone raisins.

Arch.: The flat piece upon which the window shuts down, corresponding to the sill of a door.

stool-ball, s. A game at ball, formerly played by young women.

"The game of stool-ball, the rudimentary form of cricket, is not extinct."—Saturday Review, Feb. 16, 1884, p. 229.

"Teaching every stop and key

To those upon the pipe that play."
Drayton: Muses Elysium; Nymph, iv.

(3) The handle and leverage which act upon the rows of pipes in an organ; a register.

(4) The series of pipes thus acted on. Organ-stops are of two kinds, flue and reed; the tone of flue-pipes is produced by directing a current of air against a sharp edge called the lip; the tone of reed-pipes is produced by setting a metal tongue in motion at the opening of a tube. Flue-stops are opened or closed at the top; as, open diapason, stopped diapason, &c. The tone of a stopped pipe is an octave lower than that produced by an open pipe of the same length. An open pipe of 8 ft. in length gives the note c c, the lowest note on the manuals of a modern organ; it is customary, therefore, to write on stop-handles the length of the longest pipe of the series, thus informing the player of the pitch of the stop, e. g., double diapason, 16 ft.; open diapason, 8 ft.; stopped diapason, 8 ft. tone (4 ft. stopped); octave or principal, 4 ft.; flute, 4 ft. tone, &c. The 8 ft. flue-stops constitute the foundation stops. Stops containing more than one rank of pipes, such as mixture, sesquialtera, &c., are called compound stops. Stops sounding the interval of a twelfth, or tierce (and sometimes also the octave and the fifteenth), are called Mutation stops.

stork, storke, s. [A. S. storc; Dan., Sw., Dut. & Ger. stork.]

Ornith.: Any individual of the genus Ciconia, or of the sub-family Ciconiinae. In form the storks resemble the herons, but are more robust, and have larger bills, shorter toes, with a non-serrated claw on the middle toe. They inhabit the vicinity of marshes and rivers, where they find an abundant supply of food, consisting of frogs, lizards, fishes, and even young birds. Storks are migratory, arriving from the south at their breeding haunts in the early spring, and departing again in the autumn. The White or House Stork (Ciconia alba), which is common in many countries of Central Europe, constructs a large nest, most frequently on the chimney of a cottage. The plumage is dirty white, the quills and longest feathers on the wing-covers black; beak and feet red. The male is about forty-two inches long, the female somewhat less. The Black Stork (C. nigra), from the center and east of Europe, Asia, and Africa, has the upper surface black, the lower parts white. Storks are protected by laws in some countries for their services in destroying small mammals and reptiles, and in consuming offal. They have also been celebrated from bōll, bōy; pōut, jōwł; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.

ancient times for their affection for their young; their reputation for regard for the old birds is much overrated, though heralds have adopted the stork as an emblem of piety and gratitude.

stork-billed kingfishers, s. pl.

Ornith.: The genus Pelargopsis (q. v.).

stork's bill, s.

Bot.: (1) The genus Erodium, and spec. Erodium moschatum; (2) Geranium robertianum (Britten & Holland); (3) The genus Pelargonium (Treas. of Bot.). All are so named from their long, tapering seed-vessels.

storm, s. [A. S. storm; cogn. with Icel. stormr; Dut., Sw. & Dan. storm; Ger. sturm; Ital. stormo. From the same root as Lat. sterno; Eng. strew.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A violent commotion or disturbance of the atmosphere, producing or attended by wind, rain, snow, hail, or thunder and lightning; a tempest. (Often applied to a heavy fall of rain, snow, &c., without a high wind.)

"Bide the pelting of this pitiless storm."

Shakesp.: Lear, iii. 4.

¶ The severest storms which occur on the globe have their origin in the tropics. They were long known as hurricanes, but the investigation of the law of storms proved them to be rotatory, and they are now called cyclones. [CYCLONE.] Some, in their last stage, and when their force is much diminished, reach the temperate regions, and constitute the severest storms which reach these latitudes. They come from the southerly points of the compass, from which rain, heat, and storm continually arrive. Winter storms with icy wind come from the north, northwest, northeast, or the east. The storm which has left the deepest traces on the popular memory of the world is that of Nov. 26 and 27, 1783. It destroyed the Eddystone Lighthouse, off the coast of England, led to the loss of twelve men-of-war, with more than 1,800 men, on or near the British coasts, besides drowning 8,000 more unconnected with the navy, destroying multitudes of cattle and sheep and millions' worth of property. The coming of a storm is indicated by a depression in the atmosphere, and the steeper the gradients the greater its severity.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A violent disturbance or agitation of human society; a tumult, a clamor, a commotion.

"The storm subsided as quickly as it arose, and all's well that ends well, we are told."—Field, Sept. 4, 1886.

(2) A violent or vehement outbreak.

"Bills, the first appearance of which has aroused a storm of protest and denunciation from the traders."—London Morning Post.

(3) A violent or destructive calamity; a sad or distressful state of affairs; extreme distress, misfortune, or adversity.

"A brave man struggling in the storms of fate."

Pope: Prol. to Addison's Cato.

(4) A heavy shower or fall.

"Rattling storms of arrows barbed with fire."

Milton: P. L., vi. 546.

II. Mil.: A violent assault on a fortified place or strong position; a furious attempt by troops to capture a fortified place by scaling the walls, forcing the gates, or the like.

"Far more terrible to me than all the dangers of the storm itself."—Lever: Charles O'Malley, ch. ciii.

¶ (1) Magnetic storm:

Magnetism: A magnetic disturbance simultaneously affecting a large portion of the globe. Sabine records a storm of this kind felt at the same time at Prague, the Cape, Tasmania, and Toronto.

(2) Storm in a tea-cup: A great quarrel or commotion about a trifling matter.

¶ Storm is largely used in compounds, the meanings being in most cases self-explanatory; as, storm-menacing, storm-presaging, storm-tossed, &c.

storm and stress, phr. [A translation of the German sturm und drang.] Impulse, excitement, unquiet, unrest.

"There is a good deal of storm and stress in Signor C—'s pianoforte playing."—Referee, July 18, 1886, p. 3.

¶ Used also adjectively, as a storm and stress period—i. e., a period in which one's actions spring from impulse rather than judgment.

storm-beat, storm-beaten, adj. Beaten or injured by storms; weather-beaten.

"To dry the rain on my storm-beaten face."

Shakesp.: Sonnet 34.

storm-bird, s. The Stormy-petrel (q. v.).

storm-blast, s. The blast of a tempest.

storm-bound, a. Prevented from proceeding by storms or inclement weather; storm-stayed.

"For four weary days we had been storm-bound on a small island."—Field, Sept. 25, 1886.

storm-center, s. The point of greatest intensity in a storm; hence, figuratively, the place of greatest danger or violence.

"There has of late been an encouraging absence of violence, or any attempt at it, in the latest reports from the various storm-centers within the city."—Chicago News, July 10, 1894.

storm-cock, s. The Missel-thrush (q. v.).

"Our resident thrushes are the throistle, the orange-billed black-bird, missel-thrush or storm-cock, and the dipper."—St. James's Gazette, Jan. 17, 1887.

storm-cone, s. "A cone consisting of tarred canvas extended on a frame three feet high and three feet wide at base; used singly or in conjunction with a cylinder or drum as a storm-signal (q. v.). [STORM-DRUM.]

storm-door, s. An outer or additional door for protection against storms or inclement weather.

storm-drum, s. A drum or cylinder of tarred canvas three feet high and three feet wide, used as a storm-signal (q. v.).

storm-finch, s. The Stormy-petrel (q. v.).

storm-glass, s. A tube containing a liquid holding a solution which is sensible to atmospheric changes. In clear weather the substance is seen to settle near the bottom of the tube, the liquid remaining comparatively clear; previous to a storm the substance rises, causing the liquid to present a turbid and flocculent appearance.

storm-kite, s. A contrivance for sending a rope from a stranded vessel to the shore. An anchor-ball is frequently used from the shore to the vessel.

storm-pane, s. A supplementary framed sheet of glass, to substitute, in an emergency, for a broken pane in a lighthouse.

storm-pavement, s.

Hydr. Engin.: The sloping stone paving which lines the sea-face of piers and breakwaters. The breakwater glacis.

storm-petrel, s. [STORMY-PETREL.]

storm-proof, a. Proof against storms or bad weather.

storm-sail, s.

Naut.: A sail of reduced dimensions and extra stout canvas, for heavy weather; as a storm-jib, storm-trysail, &c.

storm-signal, s. A signal for indicating to mariners, fishermen, &c., the probable approach of a storm.

¶ The signals adopted by the United States Signal Service Bureau for announcing the approach of wind storms are as follows:

A cautionary signal (displayed only at stations on the lakes).—A red flag (eight feet square) with white center (four feet square) indicates that the winds expected will not be so severe but well-found, seaworthy vessels can meet them without danger.

A storm signal.—A red flag (eight feet square) with black center (three feet square) indicates that the storm is expected to be severe.

A red pennant (five feet hoist and twelve feet fly) displayed with the flags indicates easterly winds—that is, from northeast to south, inclusive, and that the storm-center is approaching.

A white pennant (five feet hoist and twelve feet fly) displayed with the flags indicates westerly winds—that is, from north to southwest, inclusive, and that the storm-center has passed.

When red pennant is hoisted above cautionary or storm signal, winds are expected from the northeast quadrant; when below, from the southeast quadrant.

When white pennant is hoisted above the cautionary or storm signal, winds are expected from the northwest quadrant; when below, from the southwest quadrant.

Night signals.—By night a red light will indicate easterly winds; a white above a red light will indicate westerly winds.

The Information Signal consists of a red pennant and indicates that the displayman has received information of a storm covering a limited area, dangerous only for vessels about to sail to certain points. The signal will serve as a notification to shipmasters that important information will be given them upon application to the displayman.

These signals, principally for the information of maritime interests, are distinct from the system of weather, temperature, and rain signals displayed throughout the country. [WEATHER SIGNALS.]

storm-stayed, storm-stead, a. Prevented from proceeding on or interrupted in the course of a journey by bad weather.

storm-window, s. An outer window to protect the inner from the effects of storms or the inclemency of the weather; also, in some localities, a window raised from the roof, and slated above and on each side.

storm, storme, v. t. & i. [STORM, s.] stōve, s. [Old Dutch stove=a stew, a hot-house; Low Ger. stove; Icel. stofa, stufa=a bathing-room with a stove; Ger. stube=a room; O. H. Ger. stufā=a heated room; Sp. estufa; Ital. stufa; Fr. étuve.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A room or place artificially heated, such as a bath, a hothouse, &c.

"When a certain Frenchman came to visit Melancthon, he found him in his stove, with one hand dandling his child in the swaddling-clouts, and the other holding a book and reading it."—Fuller: Holy State, bk. ii., ch. xi.

† Often applied to the hottest room in a Turkish bath.

2. An apparatus in which a fire is made for the purpose of warming a room or house, or for cooking, or for other purposes. They are generally made of iron, sometimes of brick or tiles, or slabs of stone, and are of various forms, according to the heating medium used, which may be coal, wood, oil, or gas. In most stoves the fire is excluded from sight, but in some it is open in front, thus at once radiating heat, and admitting air to support combustion. Some stoves have a double casing which surrounds the fuel-chamber. Into the intervals between the casings, air is admitted from the outside of the building, and from this space the heated air is conducted to the room. On the continent of Europe stoves are generally of earthenware, being made round or square, and are frequently constructed mainly of tiles.

stráik (1), s. [STROKE.] A stroke. (Scotch.) stráik (2), s. [STRAKE.]

stráin, *straine, *strayne, *strein, *streyn, *streine, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. estraindre, from Lat. stringo=to draw tight; Fr. étendre. From the same root come constrain, restrain, restriction, strict, straight, stringent, &c.]

A. Transitive:

1. To stretch; to draw out with force; to extend with great effort; as, to strain a rope.

*2. To make tighter; to bind closer.

"Thou, the more he varies forms, beware
To strain his fetters with a stricter care."

Dryden: Virgil; Georgic iv. 596.

3. To exert to the utmost.

"He strained his feeble voice to thank Auverquerque for the affectionate and loyal services of thirty years."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxv.

4. To injure or weaken by stretching or over exertion; to subject to too great exertion or effort; to injure by a twist or wrench; to sprain; as, to strain the neck or arm.

¶ Used also figuratively, in an analogous sense.

(1) To make a special, and generally inconvenient effort to oblige another.

(2) To exceed one's duty; to overstep one's commission.

*2. To strain courtesy:

(1) To use ceremony; to insist that another or others shall take precedence.

"Finding their enemy to be so curst,
They all strain courtesy who shall cope him first."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 888.

(2) To remain behind.

"My business was great; and in such a case as mine a man may strain courtesy."—Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4.

¶ To strain is properly a species of forcing; we may force in a variety of ways, that is, by the exercise of force upon different bodies, and in different directions; but to strain is to exercise force by stretching or prolonging bodies; thus to strain a cord is to pull it to its full extent; but we may speak of forcing any hard substance in, or forcing it out, or forcing it through, or forcing it from a body; a door or a lock may be forced by violently breaking them; but a door or a lock may be strained by putting the hinges or the spring out of place. So, likewise, a person may be said to force himself to speak, when by a violent exertion he gives utterance to his words; but he strains his throat or his voice when he exercises force on the throat or lungs so as to extend them.

stráin (1), *straine, *strayne, *strein, subst. [STRAIN, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A violent effort; an excessive exertion or straining of the limbs, muscles, or mind.

"Troublesome offers and streins to the seage without doing anything."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxii., ch. xxi.

strāt'-ē-gīst, s. [English strateg(y); -ist.] One skilled in strategy.

strā-tē'-gūs, s. [Gr. stratēgos.] [STRATAGEM.] An Athenian general officer.

strāt'-ē-gŷ, s. [Gr. stratēgia=generalship, from stratēgos=a general; Fr. stratégie; Sp. estrategia; Ital. & Lat. strategia.]

1. Mil.: The science, as distinguished from the art of war; the direction of a campaign; the combination and employment of his available forces, by a commander-in-chief, to bring a campaign to an end, as distinct from the minor operations by which it is sought to effect that result, and which are subsidiary to the general plan. [TACTICS.]

2. The use of artifice, stratagem, or finesse in carrying out any project.

strāth, s. [Gael. srath; Wel. ystrad=a valley.] A valley through which a river runs. (Scotch.)

"Arrived at the bottom of the strath on the seacoast."—Blackie: Highlands and Islands, p. 40.

2. A hillock; a little mound or hill.

"Here and there are pockets, knolls, or straths of gravel."—London Times.

strāths'-pēy, s. [See def.]

1. A kind of dance in duple time, so called from having been first practiced in the district of Strathpey, Scotland. It resembles the reel, but is slower in movement. It was invented about the beginning of the eighteenth century.

"The best dancer of a strathspey in the whole strath."—Scott: Waverley, ch. xviii.

2. A kind of dance music adapted to this dance.

strāt'-ī-fī-cā'-tion, s. [English stratify; c connective; -ation.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The process by which substances in the earth have been formed into strata or layers.

2. The state of being stratified; an arrangement of strata or layers one upon another.

"A mass in which there is no stratification."—Hutton: Theory of the Earth, ii. 307.

II. Technically:

1. Elect.: A term used of the electric light when it does not appear as an uninterrupted brush, but is arranged in zones of different width and intensity. The cause of this phenomenon is not satisfactorily ascertained.

2. Physiol.: The disposition of tissues in layers in certain organs.

strāt'-ī-fīed, pa. par. or a. [STRATIFY.]

stratified-lichens, subst. pl. [HETEROMEROUS-LICHENS.]

strāt'-ī-form, a. [Eng. stratum, and form.] In the form of strata; applied to rock masses, whether aqueous or igneous, having more or less a stratified appearance.

strāt'-ī-fŷ, v. t. [Eng. stratum; suff. -fy; Fr. stratifier.] To form into strata or layers; to range in strata.

"Steel is made from the purest and softest iron, by keeping it red hot, stratified with coal-dust and wood-ashes, &c."—Hill: Materia Medica.

strāt'-ī-grāph'-īc, strāt'-ī-grāph'-īc-āl, adj. [English stratigraph(y); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining or relating to strata or their disposition; relating to the manner in which substances are arranged in strata in nature.

"The fifth book is palæontological; the sixth stratigraphical."—Athenæum, Oct. 28, 1882.

strāt'-ī-grāph'-īc-āl-lŷ, adv. [English stratigraphically; -ly.] In a stratigraphical manner; as regards stratigraphy or the disposition of strata.

strā-tīg'-rā-phŷ, s. [Eng.=a stratum, and Gr. graphō=to write, to describe.]

Geol.: That department of geology which deals with the disposition or arrangement of strata, or the order in which they succeed each other.

strāt'-ī-ō-mŷ'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. stratiomy(s); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Notacantha. Antennæ three jointed, and having in most cases a terminal stylet with five or six rings. When this is absent, the third articulation is long and fusiform. Wings in many species couched one upon the other. There are two sub-families—Stratiomyinæ and Xylophaginæ.

strāt'-ī-ō-mŷ'-ī-næ, s. [Mod. Lat. stratiomy(s); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Entom.: A sub-family of Stratiomyidæ. Abdomen with five free segments.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, wōd, sōn: mūte. cūb. cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

strät'-i-o-mÿs, s. [Gr. stratios=warlike, and muia=a fly.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Stratiomyidae. The best-known species is Stratiomys chamceleon, a large, handsome fly, a little more than half an inch long, the color brassy black, with tawny hairs; the scutellum yellow, with two long spines; the abdomen black with yellow spots and bands. The female deposits her eggs on the lower side of the water-plantain, Alisma plantago; the pupa floats like a boat.

strät-i-ō-tē-æ, s. pl. [Lat. stratiot(es); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Hydrocharidaceæ, having the ovary six, eight, or nine-celled.

strät-i-ō-tēs, s. [Lat. from Gr. stratiōtēs=(1) a soldier; (2) a water-plant (see def.), so named from the sword-like foliage.]

Bot.: Water-soldier; the typical genus of Stratiotæ (q. v.). Only known species, Stratiotes aloides, a stoloniferous submerged dioecious herb, with the leaves, which are all radical, triangular, aculeate, serrate; the scape four to six inches long, compressed, two-edged; the perianth six-parted, white; the stamens twelve or thirteen, with twenty-three or twenty-four stamens; six stigmas, and a six-celled, many-seeded, baccate fruit. It is a very ornamental plant. It remains under water during the greater part of the year; but appears on the surface at the time when the seeds require to be fertilized.

strā-tōc'-rā-phÿ, s. [Gr. stratos=an army, and kratō=to rule.] Military government; government by military chiefs and an army.

"Morbidly anxious for the support of a composite stratocracy and a decaying despotism."—London Daily News.

strā-tōg'-rā-phÿ, s. [Gr. stratos=an army, and graphō=to write, to describe.] A description of armies or of what belongs to an army.

strā-tōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Eng. strata, and meter.] An instrument for determining in what manner geological strata press upon each other. (Mayne.)

strā-tōn'-ic, a. [Gr. stratos=an army.] Pertaining or relating to an army.

strā-tō-pē'-ite, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Min.: An amorphous mineral resulting from the alteration of rhodonite, the manganese passing from protoxide to sesquioxide. Dana makes it a variety of neotocite, but it is a doubtful compound. Found with rhodonite at Filipstad, Sweden.

strā-tōt'-ic, a. [Gr. stratos=an army.] Warlike, military.

strā'-tūm (pl. strā'-ta), s. [Lat.=that which is laid flat or spread out, neut. sing. of stratus, pa. par. of sterno=to strew (q. v.).]

I. Ord. Lang.: A bed or layer artificially made of any material.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: A layer of tissue.

2. Geol.: A bed or mass of matter spread out over a certain surface, in most cases by the action of water, but sometimes also by that of wind. The method in which stratification by the agency of water has been effected in bygone times may be understood by a study of the manner in which successive layers of gravel, sand, mud, &c., are deposited in a river or running brook. The same process has been at work through untold periods of time. The greater part of the earth's crust, in nearly every land, is found to be thus stratified. Strata may be conformable (q. v.), or unconformable (q. v.). In the former case there generally is a considerable approach to parallelism among them. It is, however, inferior in exactness to that of cleavage planes. Strata laid down by water, as a rule, retain fossil remains of the animals and plants imbedded in them when they were soft and plastic. Metamorphism generally destroys those organic remains, but leaves the stratification undisturbed; thus there are two kinds of strata—sedimentary and metamorphic—nearly synonymous with fossiliferous and non-fossiliferous stratified rocks. Most strata have a dip (q. v.) and a strike (q. v.). The fossils will in most cases show whether strata are lacustrine, fluvial, or marine. They prove that deposit was very slow. One stratum may overlap another, or a stratum may thin out, or an outcrop of it may exist. As a rule, the lowest are the oldest, but some great convulsion may have tilted over strata in limited areas, so that the oldest have been thrown uppermost. A study of the same beds over a wide expanse of country prevents error in estimating the relative age of strata thus reversed. The thickness of the stratified rocks is believed to be about twenty miles, or 100,000 feet. They are not all present at one place, or even in one country. Though a surprisingly large number are to be found in America, yet some foreign beds require to be inserted in the series, and even then great gaps remain, each representing a lapse of time. For the order of superposition, see Fossiliferous. [GEOL. OGY.]

strā'-tūs, s. [Latin=a strewing, a covering.] [STRATUM.]

Meteor.: A very large and continuous horizontal sheet of cloud, looking, in many cases, as if it rested on the ground. It occurs chiefly at sunset and disappears at sunrise. It is common in autumn, but rare in spring.

strāucht, strāught (ch, gh guttural), v. t. [STRAUGHT, pa. t.] To stretch out; to make straight. (Scotch.)

"Hand of woman, or of man either, will never strought him."—Scott: Bride of Lammermoor, ch. xxiii.

strāught (gh guttural), pa. t. & pa. particip. [STRETCH, v.]

strā-vā'-dī-ūm, s. [Malabar name Latinized.]

Bot.: A genus of Barringtoniaceæ; calyx four-parted, ovary two-celled, fruit four-sided, ribbed. The root of Stravadium racemosum is somewhat bitter, but not unpleasant to the taste. Hindu doctors consider it aperient, deobstruent, and cooling. The bark is supposed to possess qualities like those of Cinchona.

strā-vāig', strā-vāgue', v. i. [O. Fr. estravaguer, from Lat. extravago, from extra=beyond, and vago=to wander; Ital. stravagare.] To wander; to tramp about idly. (Scotch.)

strā-vāig'-ēr, s. [Eng. stravaig; -er.] One who wanders about idly; a tramp, a stroller, a vagabond. (Scotch.)

strāw, *strawe, *stre, *stree, s. & a. [A. S. strew, streow, stred; cogn. with Dut. stroo; Icel. strá; Dan. straa; Sw. strå; O. H. Ger. strou; Ger. stroh; Lat. stramen=straw; struo=to heap up.] [STREW.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The stalk or stem of certain species of grain, pulse, &c., especially of wheat, rye, oats, barley and pease; it is principally used for plaiting, thatching, paper-making, and litter.

(2) A piece of such a stalk or stem.

"When shepherds pipe on oaten straws."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

(3) A bundle or mass of the stalks of certain species of grain when cut and after being thrashed; as, a load of straw. (In this sense the word does not admit of a plural.)

2. Fig.: Used proverbially for anything worthless or of no account; a fig, a jot.

"And when that they ben accompliced, yet ben they not worth a stre."—Chaucer: Tale of Melibeus.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: Linnæus' name for the culm or stem of grasses.

2. Mining: A fine straw filled with powder, and used as a fuse.

B. As adj.: Made, plaited, or composed of straw; as, a straw bed, a straw bonnet, a straw hat, &c.

† (1) A man of straw: The figure of a man formed of a suit of old clothes stuffed with straw; hence, the mere resemblance of a man; one of no substance or means; an imaginary person.

(2) In the straw: Lying-in, as a mother; in child-bed.

"Although, by the vulgar popular saw,
All mothers are said to be in the straw,
Some children are born in clover."

Hood: Miss Kilmansegg.

† Fuller (Worthies; Lincoln) says that "this English plain proverb . . . shows feather-beds to be of no ancient use among the common sort of our nation." Burgoyne (Heiress, i. 1) suggests that it arose from the practice of laying down straw before the houses of persons who were ill.

* (3) To break a straw: To quarrel.

* (4) To lay a straw: To pause.

† Straw is commonly used in compounds, most of which are self-explanatory: as, straw-roofed, straw-stuffed, &c.

straw-bail, subst. Bail given by an impecunious person; worthless bail.

straw-belle, s.

Entom.: A European geometer moth, Aspilates gilvaria. The caterpillar feeds on the yarrow.

straw-bid, s. A bid which the maker is either unable or unwilling to make good.

straw-board, s. Thick paper-board made altogether or principally from straw; usually that of wheat or rye.

straw-bond, s. [STRAW-BAIL.]

straw-braid, subst. The same as STRAW-PLAIT (q. v.).

straw-built, a. Built or constructed of straw. (Macaulay: Capys, xvii.)

straw-carrier, s.

1. An endless apron in a thrashing-machine to lift the straw as it comes from the cylinder, and discharge it at the tail of the machine. The carrier being of open work, the grain and chaff are sifted out on the way.

2. A straw elevator at the end of the thrasher to lift the straw on to the rack.

straw-cōlor, s. & a.

A. As subst.: The color of dry straw; a pale yellow.

B. As adj.: Straw-colored.

straw-colored, a. Of the color of dry straw; of a pale yellow color.

Straw-colored bat.

Zoöl.: Natalus albiventer, from South and Central America.

straw-cutter, s. An instrument or machine for cutting straw for fodder or other purposes.

straw-drain, s. A drain filled with straw.

straw-fiddle, s. A name sometimes given to the claque-bois (q. v.), when the rods rest on cylinders of twisted straw instead of on cords. (Tyndall: On Sound, lect. iv.)

straw-fork, s. A pitchfork.

straw-house, s. A house or shed for holding straw after the grain has been thrashed out.

straw-paper, s. Paper made wholly or principally from straw.

straw-plait, straw-plat, s. A plait or braid formed of straw, chiefly of rye, plaited together, and generally from half to an inch wide. These plaits when sewn together are used to form different descriptions of ladies' bonnets, hats for both sexes, &c. For hats the whole straw is used; for bonnets it is split, and the part under the hush removed. The braids are plaited with from eleven to thirteen straws each. Their length is from 300 to 320 feet, their width and the quantity of straw entering into them varying according to quality.

straw-rope, s. A rope made of straw twisted, and used to secure the thatch of corn ricks and stacks and of cottages.

straw-underwing, s.

Entom.: A European night-moth, Cerigo cytherea, the hinder wings of which are straw-colored, with a broad smoke-colored marginal band. The larva feeds on the grasses which grow on dry and stony hills; the chrysalis is subterranean.

straw-worm, s. A worm bred in straw; the cad-dis-worm.

strāw, v. t. [STRAW, s.] To spread, strew, or scatter. [STREW.]

"The ashes of his body were after his death strawed abroad through the isle of Salamina."—North: Plutarch, p. 81.

strāw'-bēr-rÿ, s. [Eng. straw, and berry; A. S. stredberige, its runners being like straws (Skeat), or from the ancient practice of laying straw between the rows, to keep the ground moist and the fruit clean (Loudon).]

Botany & Hort.: In botany, the genus Fragaria (q. v.); in horticulture, its cultivated species, spec., Fragaria vesca, of which there are wood and alpine varieties; F. elatior, the Hautbois, F. virginiana, the Virginian or Scarlet, F. grandiflora, the Pine, and F. chilensis, the Chilean Strawberry. The first of these has the leaflets usually sessile, the pedicels with silky appressed hairs; the flowers, which appear in April and May, hermaphrodite. The Hautbois, F. elatior, is much larger, has the leaflets often shortly stalked, the pedicels with spreading hairs. The Virginian or Scarlet Strawberry has the leaves nearly smooth, dark green, of thin texture, with sharp serratures, the fruit mostly small. The Pine Strawberry has the leaves almost smooth, dark green, of firm texture, with obtuse serratures, the flower and fruit large; the latter white to nearly purple. The Chilean Strawberry has very villous or hoary leaves, with small thick leaflets, having obtuse serratures, the fruit large but insipid. All have run into varieties and sub-varieties, besides producing various hybrids. Strawberries are cultivated with ease, the plants spread rapidly by suckers, but require to be renewed from time to time. The strawberry is an exceedingly wholesome article of food. Eaten alone or with sugar and cream it is easily digested, and does not become acid in the stomach. It promotes perspiration, and is refrigerating, has some effect on the gout and the stone, and is not without influence in pulmonary consumption.

¶ Barren strawberry is a book name for Potentilla fragariastrum.

strawberry-blite, s.

Bot.: The genus Blitum (q. v.).

strawberry-bush, s.

Bot.: Euonymus americanus.

strawberry-clover, s.

Botany: Trifolium fragiferum. Named from its round, pink, strawberry-like heads of seed, formed by the inflated calyx.

strawberry-leaves, s. pl. A symbolical term for a dukedom, the coronet of a duke being ornamented with eight strawberry-leaves. (See illustration under CORONET.)

strawberry-pear, s.

Bot.: Cercus triangularis, a kind of cactus growing in the West Indies, and bearing a fruit which is sweetish, slightly acid, pleasant and cooling.

strawberry-tomato, s.

Botany: Physalis alkekengi, the Winter-cherry (q. v.).

strawberry-tongue, s.

Pathol.: A term applied to the tongue when it is clean and preternaturally red in one stage of scarlatina.

strawberry-tree, s.

Botany: Arbutus unedo. Named from the shape and color of its fruit. [ARBUTUS.]

†strawberry-ware, s.

Bot.: Fucus vesiculosus, when the receptacles are large and swollen. (Scotch.) (Britten & Holland.)

strāw'-en, *strāwne, adj. [Eng. straw, s.; -en.] Made of straw; straw.

"Lik'st a strawne scare-crow in the new-sowne field, Reard on some sticke, the tender corne to shield."
Bp. Hall: Satires, iii. 7.

strāw'-y, *strāw'-le, a. [Eng. straw, s.; -y.] Pertaining to, made of, or resembling straw; consisting of straw.

"Unlike, O much unlike, the strawy shed, Where Mary, queen of Heaven, in humbless lay."
Thompson: The Nativity.

strāy, *straie, v. i. & t. [O. French estraier=to stray; Prov. estradier=one who strays, one who roves about the streets or ways, from estrada=a street; O. Fr. estree=a street; O. Ital. stradiotto=a wanderer, a gadder about, from strada=a street (q. v.).]

A. Intransitive:

I. Literally:

1. To wander, as from the direct course; to deviate; to go out of one's way or from the proper line; to go astray.

2. To move about at large; to roam, to rove, to wander.

"But when the swarms are eager of their play, strēngth, strengthe, s. [A. S. strengdhu, from strang=strong (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That property, attribute, or quality of an animal body, by which it is enabled to move itself or other things. The strength of animals is the muscular force or energy which they are capable of exerting. For the purpose of comparing the strength or the effects produced by the energy exerted by different animals, or by the same animal under different circumstances, it is usual to assume as a dynamic unit the force required to raise one pound of weight through one foot of space in one minute of time. [HORSE-POWER.]

"But their lot had fallen on a time when men had discovered that the strength of the muscles is far inferior to the strength of the mind."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

2. The quality or property of bodies by which they sustain the application of force without breaking or giving way; solidity, toughness, tenacity. The strength of a body is tested by forces acting in different ways; thus a body may be torn asunder by a tensile or stretching force, or by a direct pull in the direction of its fibers, as in the case of a rope, &c.; or it may be broken across by a transverse strain, crushed by a pressure exerted in the direction of its length, twisted, shorn across, &c.

Sir Victor Brooke, in his arrangement of the revised family Bovidae, has a subfamily (Tragelaphinae) of the same extent as the old Strep-sicere.

strēp'-sī-lās, s. [Pref. strepsi-, and Gr. las = a stone.]

Ornith.: A genus of Charadriidae, by some authorities made the type of a sub-family, Strepsilatinæ (q. v.). Beak strong, forming an elongated cone as long as the head; nostrils basal, lateral, lineal, pervious, partly covered by a membrane; wings long, pointed; feet four-toed, three in front (united by a membrane at base) and one behind. There are two species, almost cosmopolitan.

strēp-sī-lā-tī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. strepsilas genit. strepsilat(is); Lat. fem. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Charadriidae, with three genera: Pluvianellus, Aphirza, and Strepsilas (q. v.).

†strēp-sīp'-tēr, s. [STREPSIPTERA.]

Entom.: Any insect of the group Strepsiptera (q. v.).

†strēp-sīp'-tēr-a, s. pl. [Pref. strepsi-, and Gr. pteron = a wing.]

Entom.: A group of Insects parasitic on the Hymenoptera. By some writers they are made a distinct order, while others regard them as a degraded group of Coleoptera, and place them in a family Stylopidae (q. v.).

strēp-sīp'-tēr-an, s. [STREPSIPTER.] The same as STREPSIPTER (q. v.).

strēp-sīp'-tēr-ōus, a. [Eng. strepsipter; -ous.] Of or pertaining to the Strepsiptera (q. v.).

†strēp-sī-rhī'-nā, s. pl. [Pref. strepsi-, and Gr. rhis (genit. rhinos) = the nose.]

Zoöl.: Owen's name for the Lemuroidea, from their having twisted or curved nostrils at the end of the snout.

†strēp'-sī-rhīne, a. [STREPSIRHINA.] Of, belonging to, or characteristic of the Strepsirhina (q. v.).

strēp-sō-dōn-tō-saū'-rūs, s. [Greek strephō, fut. strepsō = to turn; odous (genit. odontos) = a tooth, and sauros = a lizard.]

Palæont.: A doubtful genus of Amphibia, found in the Newcastle and the Belgian Lower Coal-measures.

strēp'-sō-dūs, s. [Gr. strephō, fut. strepsō = to turn, and odous = a tooth.]

Palæont.: A genus of Holoptychiidae, from Devonian and Carboniferous strata.

strēp-tō-bāc-tē-ri-a, s. pl. [Greek streptos = twisted; baktēria = a staff, or rod.] Rod-shaped bacteria associated in chains or chaplets.

strēp-tō-cōc'-qī, s. pl. [Gr. streptos = twisted, and kokkos = a berry.] Cocci that form chains.

strēp'-tō-pūs, s. [Greek streptos = twisted, and pous = a foot. Named from the bent flower-stalks.]

Bot.: A genus of Uvulaceæ. Perennial, herbaceous plants, with creeping rootstocks, a six-parted, campanulate corolla, a three-celled ovary, and succulent fruit. The roots of Streptopus amplexifolius, a native of Hungary, have been used in gargles.

strēp-tō-spōn'-dŷ-lūs, s. [Gr. streptos = turned, and spondylos = a vertebra.]

Palæont.: A genus of Crocodilia, founded on vertebrae from Oolitic and Wealden formations. It was placed by Owen in his provisional group Opisthocœlia, but is now referred to the Amphicœlia.

strēss, stresse, s. [An abbreviation of distress (q. v.).] [STRESS, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Distress, trouble, affliction.

"With this sad hersall of his heavy stresse."

Spenser: F. Q., III. xi. 18.

2. A distress: goods taken under a distress. [II. 2.]

3. A stretching or straining; strain.

4. Effort or exertion made; strain.

"Though the faculties of the mind are improved by exercise, yet they must not be put to a stress beyond their strength."—Locke.

5. Constraining, urging, or impelling force, power, or influence; pressure, force, violence; as, to be driven out of the course by stress of weather.

6. Weight, importance, or influence imputed or ascribed; important part or influence; emphasis.

"So much stress should never be laid on faith, or any other motive of action, as to exclude other motives."—Gilpin: Hints for Sermons, vol. i., § 24.

7. Accent, emphasis.

"Those syllables, which I call long, receive a peculiar stress of voice from their acute accent."—Foster: On Accent, p. 48.

II. Technically:

Mech.: Force exerted in any direction or manner between contiguous bodies or parts of bodies, and taking specific names according to its direction or mode of action; as—

(1) Compressive stress: Tending to crush a body.

(2) Shearing stress: Tending to cut it through.

(3) Tensile stress: Tending to draw or pull the parts of a body asunder.

(4) Torsional stress: Tending to twist it asunder, the force acting with leverage.

(5) Transverse or lateral stress: Tending to bend it or break it across, the force being applied laterally, and acting with leverage.

¶ Stress is general in sense and application; emphasis is a mode of the stress. The stress is a strong and special exertion of the voice on one word, or one part of a word, so as to distinguish it from another. The stress may consist in an elevation of voice, or a prolonged utterance; the emphasis is that species of stress which is employed to distinguish one word or syllable from another; the stress may be accidental; but the emphasis is an intentional stress. We lay a stress or emphasis on a particular point of our reasoning, in the first case, by enlarging upon it longer than on other points; or, in the second case, by the use of stronger expressions or epithets. (Crabb.)

strēss, stresse, v. t. [O. Fr. estresir, estroissir, estroysser = to straiten, to pinch, to narrow, to compress, from Lat. strictus = strict (q. v.).]

1. To narrow, to compress.

2. To press, to urge, to distress; to put to straits or difficulty.

3. Mining: A small vein of ore, diverging from the main vein and passing off into the rock. Still smaller veins are called threads. A string is often worth following to great distances from the vein from which it diverges. Miners view strings as feeders of such a vein, and believe that, as a rule, its productiveness is proportioned to their number.

4. Music: Prepared wire or catgut, plain or covered, used for musical instruments. Strings of steel or brass wire are used for all instruments which are struck with hammers or plectra, as dulcimers, zithers, mandolines, and pianofortes, and strings of catgut for instruments played with the unprotected fingers, or with a bow, as guitars, harps, violins, violas, violoncellos, and double-basses. Violin strings are made of catgut, each string being of a different thickness, according to the tone and tension required, the fourth string being covered with a fine wire, either of silver or white metal; hence it is called the silver string. The covered strings on the guitar are upon a basis of silk instead of catgut, and the double-bass strings are of thick gut uncovered; the two lowest strings on the violoncello are silver strings.

5. Shipwright.: The uppermost row of planks in a ship's ceiling, or that between the upper edge of the upper deck-ports and the gunwale.

strix, s. [Lat., from Gr. strix=stringx=an owl, lit., the screecher, from strizō, trizō=to screech, to scream.]

Ornithology:

*1. A genus founded by Linnæus, containing all the owls known to him. This genus was divided by Brisson, who made Strix stridula (Linn.), the Tawny Owl (the Syrnium aluco of some authors), the type of his genus Strix [3], and the S. otus (Linn.), the type of a new genus, Asio. (Ibis, 1876, p. 94-104.)

*2. A genus founded by Savigny, with S. flammea (Linn.), the Screech Owl, as its type. Fleming gave to this bird the generic name Aluco (Latinized from Ital. allucco, probably by Gazu, the translator of Aristotle, 1508), and defined it thus: Beak straight at base, decurved towards point; nostrils oval, oblique; facial disc large and complete, narrowing rapidly below the eyes towards the beak; auditory opening square, large, furnished with a large, nearly rectangular operculum; wings long and ample; tail shortish; legs long and slender, clothed with downy feathers to the origin of the toes; hind toe reversible; head smooth, not furnished with tufts. Very many authors, however, still retain the name Strix. This genus is the type of the Alucine section, in which the hinder margin of the sternum is entire or slightly sinuated, the keel united with the furcula, and the manubrial process absent; the beak in all is straight at the base, and the claw of the middle toe serrated on the inner edge.

3. According to Brisson, and the modern taxonomists, a genus of Strigidæ, with several species, widely distributed. Bill decurved from the base; nostrils large; facial disk large and complete; ears large and furnished in front with a large, crescentic operculum, broad below, tapering above; wings short and rounded; tail long, concave beneath; legs and toes feathered; head large, round, and without tufts. The genus is the type of the Strigine section, in which the hinder margin of the sternum is characterized by two or four more or less deep clefts. This section may be further sub-divided into owls which do, and owls which do not possess an operculum.

(7) Appetite.

"You have a good stroak with you."—Swift: Polite Conversation, ii.

II. Technically:

1. Games: The act of striking the ball with the cue, racket, club, &c. (Used in billiards, rackets, tennis, golf, &c.)

2. Rowing:

(1) The sweep of an oar.

"Finishing the stroke with a jerk."—Field, Sept. 4, 1886.

(2) The stroke-oar or strokesman of a boat.

"Stroke still requires more life, his feather also is not always as clear as it might be."—Field, March 5, 1887.

3. Steam-eng.: The length of rectilinear motion of a piston, pump-rod, plunger, &c. The stroke of a valve is called its travel or throw.

¶ Stroke of paralysis or apoplexy:

Pathol.: A sudden attack of paralysis or apoplexy.

stroke-oar, s.

Rowing: The aftermost oar in a boat, or the rower who pulls it; the strokesman.

strōke, strōak, stroake, v. t. [A. S. strācian, from strāc, pa. tense of strican=to strike; German streicheln=to stroke, from streichen=to rub; Dut. strooken; Dan. stryge; Sw. stryka.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To rub gently with the hand to express kindness or affection; to rub gently in one direction; to soothe.

"They stroke her neck; the gentle heifer stands, And her neck offers to their stroking hands."

Dryden: Ovid; Metamorphoses i.

2. To smooth; to rub down; as, stroking the beard.

3. To act as a strokesman to or in.

"Bicknell, who has hitherto stroked the boat."—Field, Feb. 27, 1886.

II. Masonry: To work the face of a stone so as to produce a sort of fluted surface.

¶ To stroke the wrong way of the hair: To ruffle, to annoy.

strōk'-ēr, strōak'-ēr, s. [Eng. stroke, v.; -er.]

1. One who strokes; specif., one who pretended to cure by stroking the part affected.

"They will remind us of the cures worked by Greatrix, the stroaker, in the memory of our fathers: and of those performed at the tomb of Abbé Paris, in our own."—Warburton: Works, vol. x., ser. 27.

*2. A flatterer.

strōkes'-man, s. [Eng. stroke, s., and man.]

Rowing: The man who pulls the aftermost oar, and thus sets the time of the stroke to the rest of the crew; the stroke-oar.

strōk'-īngs, strōak'-īngs, s. pl. [STROKE, v.] The last milk drawn from a cow. (Prov.)

"The cook entertained me with choice bits, the dairy-maid with stroakings."—Smollett: Roderick Random, ch. xl.

strō'-kle, s. [STROCAL.]

strōll, stroyle, v. i. [Etym. doubtful. According to Skeat, it is a doublet of straggle, being a frequent form from Dan. stryge=to stroll; Sw. stryka.] To rove; to wander on foot; to ramble leisurely or idly.

"'Tis she who nightly strolls with sauntering pace."

Gay: Trivia, iii. 267.

strōll, subst. [STROLL, v.] A wandering on foot; a leisurely, idle ramble.

"Making trespass of this nature a specific offense, to be more severely dealt with than an ordinary stroll upon alien territory."—Field, Sept. 4, 1886.

strōll'-ēr, stroul-er, s. [Eng. stroll; -er.] One who strolls about; a wanderer, a vagrant, a vagabond; specif., an itinerant or strolling player.

"Your fathers (men of sense and honest bowlers) Disdain'd the mummery of foreign strollers."—Fenton: Prol. to Spartan Dame.

strōll'-īng, a. [STROLL, v.] Wandering about, itinerant; not staying for any time in one place. (Especially used with actor or player.)

"'He is a strolling actor,' said the lieutenant, contemptuously."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. iii.

strō-mā (pl. strō'-mā-tā), s. [Gr. strōma (genit. strōmatos) = a bed.]

1. Anat.: A layer, bed, or stratum.

2. Bot.: A thallus (q. v.), specially the substance in which certain perithecia or fructifying cells are immersed.

strō-mā-tē'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. stromateus]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.

Ichthy.: A family of Acanthopterygii Cottoscombriformes, with two genera, Stromateus and Centrolophus. Body oblong and compressed, covered with very small scales; eyes lateral; dentition feeble; oesophagus armed with numerous horny, barbed processes; dorsal single, long, without distinct spinous division.

strō-mā'-tē-ūs, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. strōma = a bed.]

Ichthy.: The type-genus of Stromateidæ, with ten species, from tropical and sub-tropical seas. There are no ventral fins in the adult.

strō-māt'-īc, a. [Gr. strōmateus = a coverlet (pl. patchwork), from strōma = a bed.] Miscellaneous; composed of different kinds.

strō-mā-tōl'-ō-gŷ, s. [Gr. strōma (genit. strōmatos) = a bed; suff. -ology.]

Geol.: Stratigraphy (q. v.).

strōmb, s. [STROMBUS.]

Zoöl.: Any individual of the family Strombidæ (q. v.), though some authors confine the name to the genus Strombus (q. v.). The Strombs are very active, and feed on carrion. Strombus gigas, the Fountain-shell of the West Indies, is one of the largest living shells, sometimes weighing four or five pounds. They are imported in large numbers from the Bahamas for the manufacture of porcelain and to be cut into cameos. (See illustration under Strombus.)

strōm'-bī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. strombus]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.

Zoöl. & Palæont.: Wing-shells; a family of Siphonostoma (q. v.). Shell with expanded lip, deeply notched near canal; operculum claw-shaped, serrated on outer edge. Animal with large eyes on thick pedicels, from the middle of which the slender tentacles arise; foot narrow, ill-adapted for creeping; lingual teeth single; uncini three on each side. Genera, Strombus, Pteroceras, Rostellaria, and Seraphs. They commence in the Lias.

strōm-bīd'-ī-ūm, s. [Mod. Lat., from strombus (q. v.), and Gr. eidos = appearance.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Peritrichous Infusoria, family Halteriidae, from salt and fresh water. Animalcules free-swimming, globose, or turbinate. Their movements are extremely rapid and irregular.

strōm-bū'-lī-form, a. [Mod. Lat. strombulus, from Latin strombus (q. v.), and forma = form, shape.]

1. Bot.: Twisted in a long spire, so as to resemble the convolution of a Stromb, as the legume of Aca-cia strombulifera.

2. Geol.: Shaped like a top.

strōm'-būs, s. [Lat., from Gr. strombos = a spiral shell, a top.]

1. Zoöl.: Stromb; the type-genus of Strombidæ (q. v.). Shell sub-ventricose, tubercular or spiny; spire short; aperture long, with a short canal above, truncated below; outer lip expanded, lobed above, and sinuated near the notch of the anterior canal. Woodward puts the species at sixty-five, from the West Indies, Mediterranean, Red Sea, India, Mauritius, China, New Zealand, Pacific, and Western America. Found on reefs at low water, ranging to ten fathoms.

2. Palæont.: Five species from the Chalk and three from the Miocene of the south of Europe.

Strombus Gigas.

strō-mêy'-ēr-īne, strō-mêy'-ēr-ite, s. [After Stromeyer, the discoverer of Cadmium; suff. -ine, -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral, but occurring mostly massive. Hardness, 2.5-3; specific gravity, 6.2-6.3; luster, metallic; color, dark steel-gray, tarnishing on exposure; streak shining; fracture, sub-conchoidal. Composition: Sulphur, 15.8; silver, 53.1; copper, 31.1=100, corresponding to the formula Ag₃+CuS. Occurs with copper pyrites at a few localities.

strōm'-nīte, subst. [After Stromness, Orkneys, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral supposed by Thomson, who described it, to be a carbonate of strontium, barium, and calcium. Now regarded as a mixture.

strōnd'-ward, adv. [Mid. Eng. strond = strand; -ward.] Toward the strand; in the direction of the strand.

"So walkyng to the strondward we bargeynynd by the way."—Chaucer: Tale of Beryn.

strōng, streng, stronge, adj. & adv. [A. S. strong, strang; cogn. with Dutch streng; Icel. strangr; Danish streng; Sw. strång; Ger. streng = strict. From the same root as strain, strait, straight, stretch, strict, stringent, strangle, &c.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Having physical power to act; having the power of exerting great bodily force; endowed with strength or bodily force; vigorous, robust.

"The strongest body shall it make most weak."—Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 1, 145.

2. Having ability or power to bear or endure; having physical or mental passive power.

3. Firm, solid, compact; not easily broken.

"Though the ship were no stronger than a nutshell."—Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 1.

4. Acting by physical force.

"If by strong hand you offer to break in."—Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, iii. 1.

5. Naturally sound or healthy; hale, hearty; not readily affected by disease.

"Better is the poor, being sound and strong in constitution, than a rich man afflicted in his body."—Eccles. xxx. 14.

17. Affecting the senses forcibly; as—

(1) Affecting the sight; disagreeably or forcibly bright; glaring; as, a strong light.

(2) Affecting the taste forcibly; as, a strong flavor of onions.

(3) Affecting the smell powerfully; as, a strong odor.

18. Of a high degree; great, violent, earnest.

"So strong a liking."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, i. 3.

19. Substantial, solid; not of easy digestion.

"Strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age."—Hebrews v. 12.

20. Loud, powerful.

"He cried with a strong voice."—Rev. xviii. 2.

*21. Well-established, valid, confirmed; not easily overthrown or altered.

"An ungodly custom grown strong was kept as a law."—Wisdom xiv. 16.

*22. Having great force; forcibly expressed; comprising much in few words.

"Like her sweet voice is thy harmonious song, As high, as sweet, as easy, and as strong."—Smith. (Todd.)

23. Numerous, large; as, a strong muster.

II. Technically:

1. Comm.: Tending upward in price; rising; as, a strong market.

2. Gram.: Applied to inflected words when the inflection is effected by internal vowel-change, and not by addition of a syllable; thus swim, swam, swum, is a strong verb. [WEAK.]

B. As adv.: Strongly.

¶ To go (or come) it strong: To do anything with energy or force. (Slang.)

¶ Strong is largely used in composition, the meanings of the compounds being in most cases self-explanatory; as, strong-backed, strong-smelling, strong-voiced, &c.

strong-barred, adj. Shut with strong bolts. (Shakesp.: King John, ii.)

strong-based, a. Standing upon a firm foundation. (Shakesp.: Tempest, v.)

strong-besieged, adj. Besieged by a strong force. (Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 1, 429.)

strong-bonded, a. Imposing a strong obligation.

strong-fixed, a. Firmly established.

"Strong-fixed is the house of Lancaster."—Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., ii. 5.

strong-framed, a. Possessed of a strong frame of body.

"Tut, I am strong-framed, he cannot prevail with me."—Shakesp.: Richard III., i. 4.

strong-hold, s. [STRONGHOLD.]

strong-jointed, a. Having strong limbs.

"O well-knit Samson! strong-jointed Samson!"—Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, i. 2.

strong-knit, a. Firmly-joined or compacted.

"Large proportion of his strong-knit limbs."—Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., ii. 3.

strong-man's weed, s.

Bot.: Petiveria alliacea.

strong-minded, a.

1. Having a strong or vigorous mind.

"Catharine, clever, strong-minded, intrepid, and conscious of her power, refused to stir."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

2. Not womanly or feminine; not according to female character or manners. (Applied to women claiming equality with men.)

strong-room, s. A fire-proof and burglar-proof room in which valuables are deposited for safety.

strong-sand, s.

Founding: Sand containing a large quantity of clay, and therefore tenacious.

strong-set, a. Firmly set or compacted.

strong-siding, a. Strongly-siding with or supporting.

"Attended By a strong-siding champion."—Milton: Comus, 212.

strong-tempered, a. Very hard; as, strong-tempered steel.

strong-waters, s. pl. Distilled or ardent spirits; formerly applied to acids.

"Yet in melting of metals, when they have been calcined formerly by fire or strong-waters, there is good use of additaments, as of borax, tartar, armoniac, and salt-petre."—Bacon: Physiol. Rem., p. 415.

strōng'-hānd, s. [Eng. strong, a., and hand.] Violence; superior force.

"Another would thrust him out by stronghand."—Spenser: State of Ireland.

strōng'-hōld, s. [Eng. strong, a., and hold.] A fortress, a fastness, a fortified place, a place of security.

strōng'-ish, a. [Eng. strong, a.; -ish.] Rather strong; somewhat strong.

"These included a strongish contingent from Oatham."—Field, Feb. 26, 1887.

strōng'-lŷ, adv. [Eng. strong, a.; -ly.]

1. In a strong manner; with force, strength, or power.

"Shooke so strongly."—Spenser, F. Q., I. xii.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, thiis; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhñ; -tion, -şion = zhñ. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

"'Twill stir him strongly."

Shakesp.: Henry VIII., iii. 2.

6. Vehemently, forcibly, eagerly; with energy or earnestness.

7. In large numbers.

strōn'-gyle, s. [STRONGYLUS.] Any individual of the family Strongylidæ (q. v.)

strōn'-gyl'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. strongyl(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Nematodea (q. v.). Body round, sometimes much elongated and filiform; mouth round, oval, or triangular, frequently very large, naked or armed with a horny pharyngeal armature; tail of male furnished with a bursa, usually emitting two spicules; in some the bursa is replaced by two divergent membranous lobes. Cobbold (Entozoa, p. 83) enumerates the following genera: Strongylus, Eustrongylus, Sclerostoma (= Syngamus), Dochmius, Prosthecocaster, Stenurus, Diaphanocephalus, Stephanurus, Delectrocephalus, and Dicrocephalus. [SCLEROSTOMA.]

strōn'-gyl-lūs, subst. [Gr. strongylos = round, rounded.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Strongylidæ (q. v.), with the chief characters of the family. The number of species has been variously estimated by different authorities. Strongylus bronchialis (the female an inch long, the male half that size) infests the bronchial glands in man. S. (eustrongylus) gigas is the largest known ento-parasite, the male measuring from ten inches to a foot in length, the female attaining a length of over three feet; it attacks man and the lower animals. S. micrurus infests the calf, S. contortus the sheep, and S. armatus the horse. S. quadridentatus=Sclerostoma duodenale. [SCLEROSTOMA.]

strōn'-ti-ā (ti as shī), s. [STRONTIAN.]

Chem.: [STRONTIUM-OXIDE.]

strōn'-ti-ān (ti as shī), s. & a. [After Strontian, Argyleshire, where first found.]

A. As subst.: A name sometimes given to Strontia.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to strontia; consisting of strontia.

strontian-yellow, s. A solution of strontia added to chromate of potash. It is a pale canary, and is a permanent color.

strōn'-ti-ān-īte (ti as shī), s. [Eng. strontian; suff. -ite (Min.); Fr. strontiane carbonatée; Ger. strontianit, strontian.]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral belonging to the group of anhydrous carbonates. Hardness, 3.5-4; specific gravity 3.605-3.713; luster, vitreous; color, white, gray, yellowish, shade of green occasionally; transparent to translucent; brittle. Composition: Carbonic acid, 29.8; strontia, 70.2=100, which corresponds with the formula SrOCO₂.

strōn'-ti-ān-ō-cāl'-cite (ti as shī), s. [Eng. strontian; o connect., and calcite.]

Min.: A variety of calcite in which a part of the calcium is replaced by strontium.

strōn'-tī-tēs, s. [Eng. stront(ian); -ites.]

Chem.: The name given by Hope to the metallic element afterward named Strontia (q. v.) by Klaproth.

strōn'-tīt'-ic, a. [Eng. stront(ites); -itic.] Pertaining to strontia, or strontium.

strōn'-tī-ūm (or ti as shī), s. [Latinized from strontian (q. v.).]

Chemistry: A diad metallic element, symbol Sr, atomic weight 87.3, specific gravity 2.5418; discovered by Crawford in 1787, in the native carbonate of strontium, and obtained in the metallic state by Davy in 1808. It is now easily obtained by the electrolysis of the fused chloride, or by fusing the chloride with an alloy of sodium and lead. It has a yellow color like that of calcium, and acts similarly to it when heated in chlorine, oxygen, &c., or when thrown on water. The salts of strontium color the blowpipe flame a carmine red.

¶ Strontium-carbonate=strontianite; strontium-sulphate=celestite.

Chem.: SrBr₂. Prepared by heating a solution of the carbonate in hydrobromic acid. It separates from its aqueous solution in long needles containing three molecules of water, is slightly soluble in alcohol, easily in water.

strontium-chloride, s.

Chem.: SrCl₂. Produced by heating anhydrous strontia in a stream of chlorine. It crystallizes from water in deliquescent needles or prisms, which dissolve easily in water and but slightly in alcohol.

strontium-hydrate, s.

Chem.: SrH₂O₂=Sr''O.H₂O. A crystalline compound produced by the direct union of water with strontium oxide. It has a great attraction for carbonic acid.

strontium-nitrate, s.

Chem.: Sr(NO₃)₂. Prepared by dissolving the native carbonate in nitric acid, filtering the solution and evaporating until a pellicle begins to form on the surface. It crystallizes in anhydrous octahedrons; slightly soluble in cold, very soluble in boiling water. Chiefly used in the preparation of red fire (q. v.).

strontium-oxide, s.

Chemistry: SrO. Strontia. Prepared by heating strontium nitrate to redness. It is a grayish-white, porous mass, having an alkaline taste and reaction; specific gravity 3-4, infusible, and not volatile. When moistened with water it behaves like lime, becoming hot and crumbling to a powder.

strōp (1), s. [The older form of strap (q. v.).] A strap; specifically, a razor-strop.

strōp (2), s. [O. Fr. strobe=the loop whereby the oar of a skiff hangs to the thowle (Cotgrave); Fr. étrope, estropée=a strop, from Lat. stroppus, strupus=a band.]

1. Naut.: A rope spliced into a circular form to seize around a block for hanging it.

2. Rope-making: A rope with an eye at each end, used in twisting strands.

strōp, v. t. [STROP (1), s.] To sharpen with or on a strop.

strō-phān'-thīn, s. [STROPHANTHUS.] An active poisonous compound found in the seeds of several species of strophanthus (q. v.). It is prescribed by physicians as a heart-tonic.

strō-phān'-thūs, s. [Gr. strophos=a twisted band, and anthus=a flower.] A genus of flowering plants of the order Apocynaceæ (q. v.). Several species are well known under the name of twisted-flower. [STROPHANTHIN.]

strō-phē, s. [Gr.=a turning.]

1. Gr. Drama.: The turning of the chorus from the right to the left of the orchestra, the return being the antisrophe; the part of a choral ode sung during the act of so turning; hence, in ancient lyric poetry, a term for the former of two corresponding stanzas, the latter being the antistrophe. The term is sometimes used in relation to modern poetry.

2. Bot.: The spirals formed in the development of leaves.

strō-phē, a. [Eng. strop(e); -ic.] Relating to or consisting of strophes.

strō-phī-ō'-lā, s. [STROPHIOLE.]

strō-phī-ō-lāte, strō-phī-ō-lāt-ēd, a. [Eng. strophiol(e); suff. -ate, -ated.]

Bot.: Surrounded by protuberances.

strō-phī-ōle, strō-phī-ō-lā, s. [Lat. strophium=a small wreath or chaplet, dimin. from strophium; Gr. strophion=a band, stay, or stomacher.]

Bot.: A tubercle surrounding the hilum of some seeds. It proceeds from the testa, independent of the micropyle, or funicle. Example, Viola. Called also a Caruncle.

strōph-ō-dūs, s. [Gr. strophos=a twisted band, and odous=a tooth.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Cestraciontidæ, ranging from the Lower Lias to the Chalk.

strō-phōm'-ē-nā, s. [Greek strophos=a twisted band or cord, and mēnē=the moon.]

Palæont.: A genus of Orthidæ; shell semi-circular, widest at the hinge line; concave-convex radially streaked; ventral valve with an angular notch. Known species, 129; from the Lower Silurian to the Carboniferous.

†strōph-ō-mēn'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. strophomen(a); fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A synonym of Orthidæ (q. v.).

strōph-ū-lūs, s. [Dimin. from Latin strophus; Gr. strophos=a twisted band.]

Pathology: Redgum, Tooth-rash; an eruption of minute hard, slightly-red pimples, clustered and scattered, affecting infants or young children. The largest number of pimples are on the face and the neck. It arises from irritation of the stomach, and has been supposed by some to be lichen modified by the delicate skin of the infant affected. The irritation is slight, and the disease not dangerous. Unimportant variations have led to the establishment of the species Strophulus intertinctus, S. confertus, S. candidus, and S. volaticus.

strut-beam, s. [STRUTTING-BEAM.]

strû'-thî-ô, s. [Lat., from Gr. strouthos=a sparrow, an ostrich.]

Ornith.: Ostrich; the typical genus of Struthioninæ, having only two toes, the third and fourth on each foot. Most authorities reckon but one species, Struthio camelus; but as the birds from the north of Africa have the skin of the parts not covered with feathers flesh-colored, while this skin is bluish in birds from the south, the latter are sometimes placed in a separate species (S. australis). Birds from the Somalis country have also been described as forming a distinct species (S. molybdophanes), because the skin not covered with feathers is of a leaden hue.

strû-thî-ô-la, subst. [Mod. Lat., from struthio (q. v.).] Named from the resemblance of the seeds to a bird's beak.]

Bot.: A genus of Thymelacæ, from the Cape of Good Hope. Pretty plants, with white, yellow, or red flowers, having four stamens.

strû-thî-ô-lär'-i-a, s. [Mod. Latin, from Lat. struthio (q. v.).] The aperture of the shell bears some resemblance to the foot of an ostrich.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Cerithiadae, with five species, from Australia and New Zealand, where sub-fossil specimens have been found. Shell turreted, whorls angular, aperture truncated in front, columella oblique; outer lip prominent in the middle, inner lip callous, expanded; operculum claw-shaped. Animal with cylindrical tentacles, eye-pedicles short, foot broad and short.

strû-thî-ô-nëss, s. pl. [Plural of Mod. Lat., &c. struthio (q. v.).]

Ornith.: A synonym of Ratitæ (q. v.).

strû-thî-ôn'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. struthio, genit. struthion(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of Ratitæ (q. v.). Bill short, robust, powerful, flattened, and having a nail-like process at the tip; nostrils longitudinal, basal; no hind toe present. There are two sub-families: Struthioninæ (with two genera, Struthio and Rhea) confined to Africa, and temperate South America, and Casuarinæ (sometimes made a family Casuaridae) inhabiting Australia and the islands from Cêram to New Britain.

strû-thî-ô-nî'-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin struthio, genit. struthion(is); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.] [STRUTHIONIDÆ.]

strû'-thî-ous, adj. [Lat. struthio=an ostrich.] Pertaining to or resembling the ostrich; belonging to the Ratitæ (q. v.).

"Gallinaceous and struthious birds retain the same stones in their gizzards for a long time."—Darwin: Formation of Vegetable Mold, ch. v.

strüt'-têr, s. [English strut, v.; -er.] One who struts; a pompous fellow.

"What a mere nothing it is, that this strutter has pronounced with such sonorous rhetoric."—Annot. on Glanvill's Præexistence.

Carp.: A straining-piece (q. v.).

strüt'-tîng-lÿ, adv. [Eng. strutting; -ly.] In a strutting manner; with proud or pompous walk; pompously, boastfully.

strâv'-îte, subst. [After the Russian statesman, V. Struve; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral occurring only in isolated crystals. Hardness, 2.0; specific gravity, 1.65 to 1.7; color, yellowish to brown, becoming white on exposure, by loss of water of crystallization; luster, vitreous; translucent. Composition: Phosphoric acid, 29.0; magnesia, 16.3; ammonia, 10.6; water, 44.1=100, corresponding to the formula $\text{NH}_4\text{O}_2\text{MgO} \cdot \text{PO}_5 + 12\text{H}_2\text{O}$. Found originally in a bed of peat, above which a large amount of cattle dung existed; since found in guano at various localities.

strÿch'-në-æ, strÿch'-nâ'-çë-æ, s. pl. [Modern Latin strychn(os); Latin fem. plural adj. suff. -æa, -aceæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Loganiacæ, having the aestivation of the corolla valvate.

strÿch'-nî-a, s. [STRYCHNINE.]

strÿch'-nîc, a. [Eng. strychn(ine); -ic.] Of, pertaining to, containing, or derived from strychnine.

strychnic-acid, s. [IGASURIC-ACID.]

strÿch'-nî'-na, s. [STRYCHNINE.]

strÿch'-nîne, s. [Mod. Lat. strychn(os); -ine (Chem.).]

Chem.: $\text{C}_{21}\text{H}_{22}\text{N}_2\text{O}_2$. Strychnia. A highly poisonous alkaloid, discovered in 1818 by Pelletier and Caventou in St. Ignatius' beans, and shortly afterward in Nux vomica seeds. It is obtained, together with brucine, by boiling Nux vomica seeds in dilute sulphuric acid until they become soft, crushing the seeds, and adding to the expressed liquid an excess of calcium hydrate, which throws down the two alkaloids. On washing with cold alcohol, brucine is dissolved, leaving strychnine in an impure state. When pure, it crystallizes in colorless, tetragonal prisms, having a very bitter and somewhat metallic taste, is almost insoluble in water, absolute alcohol, and ether, but soluble in spirit of wine and chloroform. Strychnine was scarcely heard of as a means of poisoning before the year 1855, the date of the Rugeley murders in England, for which Palmer was tried at the Old Bailey in 1856, and executed. The symptoms are very marked, and comprise violent tetanic convulsions, laborious respiration, from the tightening of the chest muscles, spasmodic contraction of the heart, and rigidity of the spinal column. These are succeeded by a short calm, after which they are again repeated until death or progress toward recovery ensues, the time being about two hours after taking the poison. From 1½ to 2 grains and upward generally proves fatal, and the presence of the poison can be best recognized by the color-test. When strychnine is brought under the influence of nascent oxygen, the former instantly acquires a rich blue color, successively passing into purple, violet, crimson, orange, and yellow. (Woodman & Tidy.)

strych'-nōs, s. [Lat., from Gr. strychnos=nightshade.]

Botany: The typical genus of Strychnos. Calyx five-parted; corolla tubular, funnel-shaped, limb spreading; stamens five, inserted into the throat of the corolla; ovary two-celled; style one; stigma capitate; fruit, a berry with a hard rind and a pulpy sarcocarp; seeds many, peltate. Natives of Asia, America, and Australia. Strychnos Nux Vomica, the Snake-wood, Strychnin-tree, or Nux Vomica tree, is a moderate-sized evergreen, with dark gray bark and no spines; the leaves entire, strongly three to five nerved; the flowers small, incorymb, greenish-white; the fruit round, like an orange in color, but smaller, with a brittle rind, a white, gelatinous pulp, and many seeds. It is found on hills and in forests in India and Burmah. The seeds, which are about the size and shape of a 25c. piece, constitute Nux vomica and contain strychnine (q.v.), and it is said a brown dye. The wood is very bitter, especially the root, which has been given in intermittent fevers and as an antidote to the bites of venomous serpents. S. potatorum, a tree about forty feet high, with only one seed, is the Clearing-nut tree of India; so called because the seeds render muddy water clear. They are used also in diseases of the eye. The fruit, which is like a black cherry, is eaten by the natives; the wood is used for carts, agricultural implements, and building. S. foetida, the Guiana Poison-plant, is a climber, with a stem covered with long, spreading, red hairs, and five-nerved, acuminate leaves. It furnishes the chief ingredient of the poison called Woorali, or Oorali. S. tieute, from Java, has elliptical, acuminate, three-nerved, glabrous leaves, with simple tendrils opposite to them. It yields another deadly poison. S. ligustrina is said by Blume to furnish the genuine Lignum colubrinum. It is given in Java in paralysis of the lower extremities and as an anthelmintic. S. pseudoquina, a Brazilian tree about twelve feet high, has a corky bark (said to be equal to Cinchona as a febrifuge), and short-stalked, ovate, quintuple-nerved leaves; all parts of it are intensely bitter except the fruit, which is eaten by children. The fruit of S. colubrina, a large Indian climbing shrub, is esteemed by the Telegus as an antidote to the bite of the cobra. The fruit of S. innocua is eaten in Egypt.

stry-full, *stry-ful, a. [STRIFEFUL.]

stryph-nō-dēn'-drōn, s. [Gr. stryphnos=rough, astrigent, and dendron=a tree.]

Botany: A genus of Eumimosæ. Stamens ten; legume indehiscent, leathery, pulpy within, ultimately becoming baccate. Stryphnodendron barbatemas and S. jurema are used in Brazil as astringents.

stüb, *stubbe, *stob, s. [A. S. styb, steb=a stump; cogn. with Dut. stobbe; Icel. stubb, stubbr; Dan. stüb; Sw. stubbe; Gael. stob; Lith. stebas=an upright pillar; Lat. stipes; Sansc. stamba=a post; stambh=to make fast; Gr. stypos=a stub, a stump.] [STUMP, s.] stüc'-cō, s. [Ital., from O. H. Ger. stucchi=a crust.]

1. Fine plaster used for coating walls. It is usually made of pure lime slaked and settled, mixed with clean sand. Stucco varies in quality and composition with the purpose for which it is intended. For internal decoration gypsum and pounded marble enter into its composition, as well as gelatine or glue in solution. Being mixed with water till it is of the proper consistency, it is applied to the cornices, moldings, &c., of rooms, and soon begins to set or harden, in which state it is molded, and is finished off with metal tools. For external work the stucco employed is of a coarser kind, and is variously prepared, the different sorts being generally distinguished by the name of cements. Some of these take a surface and polish almost equal to that of the finest marble. In Bastard stucco a small portion of hair is employed. Rough stucco is merely floated and brushed with water, but the best kind is troweled.

"Grotesco roofs, and stucco floors."

Pope: Imitation of Horace, sat. 6.

Ichthy.: The popular name of any species of the genus Acipenser (q. v.). The body is elongated, almost cylindrical, tapering conically to a heterocercal tail. The skeleton is cartilaginous; the skin is covered with bony scutes in longitudinal rows, between which are patches naked or furnished only with small bony scales. The snout is produced far in front of the mouth, which is situated on the under side, and furnished with barbels. Sturgeons are distributed over the whole of the northern hemisphere; they are mostly anadromous, but some species are confined to fresh water. On the approach of winter they sink deep holes in the bottom, where they crowd together and remain in a hibernating condition till the approach of spring. They are among the largest of freshwater fishes; and the larger species reach a length of about eighteen feet; they are extremely voracious, and live chiefly on worms, spawn, and fish that feed on the bottom. They are important as food-fishes; the flesh is white, well-flavored, and delicate, resembling veal; caviare is prepared from their roe, and isinglass from their swimming-bladders. The best-known species is the Common Sturgeon, Acipenser sturio. The back is usually a dull reddish, but varies to a blue or yellowish-gray, belly white, inclining to silvery, scutes gray. Numerous closely-related species occur in Europe, and some species are peculiar to North America. [BELUGA, 1, FISH-ROYAL, STERLET.]

"In England the Sturgeon is a royal fish, belonging, by Act of Parliament of the reign of Edward II., to the sovereign, except where it has been granted by charter to certain Corporations, as at Boston, in Lincolnshire."—Seeley: Fresh-water Fishes, p. 413.

stūr'-i-ō, s. [Lat.=a sturgeon (q. v.).]

Ichthy.: A lapsed synonym of Acipenser (q. v.). From this word many authorities have formed names for groups in their respective classifications, corresponding more or less closely to the modern Acipenseridae and Polyodontidae. Thus Cuvier employed the French Sturioniens; and in Modern Latin there are Sturiones (Bonaparte), Sturionia (Rafinesque), Sturionidae (Swainson), Sturionidæ (Richardson), and Sturionini (Gravenhorst).

stūr-něl'-lā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from sturnus (q. v.).]

Ornith.: A genus of Icteridae, sub-family Agelaiinae, with five species ranging from Patagonia and the Falkland Islands to the middle of this country. Body thick, stout; legs large, reaching beyond the tail, which is short and even, with acuminate feathers; bill slender, elongate; nostrils linear, covered by a membranous scale.

stūr-ni-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sturn(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: Starlings; an Old-world family of Sturniformes (q. v.). Wings long or moderate, first primary always short; nostrils oblong, more or less feathered; forehead depressed and broad; no rectal bristles. Their habits are generally gregarious, most of them frequenting the ground, where they assemble in large flocks. There are two sub-families: Buphaginae (confined to the African continent) and Sturninae (q. v.).

stūr-ni-for'-mēs, s. pl. [Modern Latin sturnus (q. v.), and Latin forma=form.]

Ornith.: A sub-order of Passeriformes (q. v.), with four families: Ploceidae, Artamidae, Alaudidae, and Sturnidae (q. v.).

stūr-ni-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sturn(us), Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Sturnidae (q. v.), a highly-characteristic Old-world group, extending to every part of the eastern hemisphere and its islands, and over the Pacific to the Samoa Islands and New Zealand, but wholly absent from the mainland of Australia. They have the characters of the family, and contain about twenty-eight genera and 126 species.

stūr-nir'-ā, s. [A euphonic word, of no significance, formed by Gray. (Agassiz.)]

Zool.: A genus of Stenodermata (q. v.). Chin with three warts in front, margined below by smaller warts. One species S. lilium, from the Neotropical region.

stūr-nūs, s. [Lat.=a starling.]

Ornith.: The typical genus of Sturninae (q. v.), with six species, ranging over the Palearctic region to India and South China in the winter. Bill as long as head, almost straight, blunt at tip; nostrils basal, supernal, partly overlaid by an operculum; gape angular, free from bristles; feathers of head and anterior part of body pointed and elongated; wings long, pointed; tail short, rectrices diverging at tip; tarsus scutellate in front, covered at side by an undivided plate, forming a sharp ridge behind; claws short and moderately curved. Sturnus vulgaris is the Starling (q. v.).

stürt, v. t. & i. [Sw. störta=to vex, to disturb; Ger. stören.] [SCOTCH.]

A. Trans.: To vex, to trouble, to molest.

B. Intrans.: To startle, to be afraid.

"He was something stürting."—Burns: Halloween.

stürt (1), s. [STURT, v.] Trouble, disturbance, vexation; heat of temper. [SCOTCH.]

stürt (2), s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Mining: An extraordinary profit made by a tributer by taking the excavation or cutting of a course of ore at a high price.

stūr'-tion, subst. [A corruption of nasturtium (q. v.).]

stūt, stutte, v. i. [Icel. stauta=to beat, to read stutteringly.] To stutter (q. v.).

"He hath Albano's imperfection too, And stuts when he is vehemently moved."

Marston: What You Will.

stūt-tēr, v. i. & t. [A frequent. from stut (q. v.); Dut. stotteren; Low Ger. stötern; Ger. stottern.]

A. Intrans.: To stammer; to hesitate in the articulation of words.

"He had stood trembling, stuttering, calling for his confessor."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

B. Trans.: To utter in a stuttering manner; to stammer out.

stūt-tēr, s. [Eng. stut; -er.]

*1. One who stutters; a stutterer.

"Many stutters are very choleric, choler inducing a dryness in the tongue."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 386.

2. A stammerer in speaking.

stūt'-tēr-ēr, s. [Eng. stutter, v.; -er.] One who stutters; a stammerer.

"Stutterers use to stammer more when the wind is in that hole."—Howell: Letters, bk. xxvii., let. 1.

stūt'-tēr-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [STUTTER, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: A hesitation in speaking, in which there is a spasmodic and uncontrollable repetition of the same syllable; stammering (q. v.).

stūt'-tēr-īng-lý, adv. [English stuttering; -ly.] In a stuttering manner; with a stutter.

stý (1), *stie, *sti, *stye, s. [A. S. stigo=a sty; cog. with Icel. stia, sti=a sty; svinsti=a swine-sty; Dan. sti; Sw. stia; O. Sw. stia, stiga; Sw. dial. sti, steg; Dut. svijnstijge; Ger. steige; O. H. Ger. stiga.] 1. A pen or inclosure for swine.

"Each friend you seek in yon enclosure lies,
All lost their form, and habitants of sties."
Pope: Homer's Odyssey, x. 338.

2. A dirty, mean, or filthy place; a hovel.

"There could not be equality between men who lived in houses and men who lived in sties."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

3. A place of debauchery.

"The houses of Calderon's stately and high-spirited Castilian gentlemen became sties of vice."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

stý, (2), stýe, s. [A contract. of stigend=swelling, rising, properly pres. par. of stigan=to rise, to climb. The full form was stigend edge=swelling eye, which was corrupted into styany, which was afterward mistaken for sty on eye; Low Ger. stig, stige; Norw. stig, sti, stige, from stiga=to rise.] A small inflammatory tumor of the nature of a boil on the edge of the eyelid, most frequently near the inner angle of the eye.

stý (1), v. t. [STY (1), s.] To shut up in, or as in, a sty.

"Here you sty me
In this hard rock, while you do keep from me
The rest of the Island." Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

stý (2), *stie, *stye, v. i. [A. S. stigan; German steigen; Dut. stijen; Icel. stiga; Sw. stiga; Dan. stige.] [STAIR.] To mount.

"Thought with his wings to stye above the ground."
Spenser: F. Q., I. xi. 25.

stý'-an, s. [STY (2), s.]

stý'-ca, s. [A. S. stic, styc.] An Anglo-Saxon coin, value half a farthing. It was principally, if not wholly, coined in the kingdom of Northumberland.

stý'-çēr-īne, s. [Eng. sty (ryl), and (gly)cerine.]

Chem.: C₉H₁₂O₃=phenyl glycerine. A trivalent alcohol, obtained by heating a mixture of styryl tribromide and water for eight or ten hours. It is very soluble in water and alcohol, and on evaporation is left as a gummy mass.

stýe, s. [STY (2), s.]

stýe, v. i. [STY (2), v.]

Stýg'-i-an, adj. [Lat. Stygus, from Styx; Gr. Styx, (genit. Stygos)=Styx, from styeō=to hate.] Pertaining to Styx, a river of hell, over which the shades of the dead were ferried by Charon; hence, hellish, infernal.

"Whose Stygian throats breathe darkness all day long."
Cowper: Task, iii. 738.

stý-gōg'-ēn-ēs, s. [Gr. Styx (genit. Stygos)=the Styx (q. v.), and gennaō=to produce. Named from their supposed volcanic abode.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Hypostomatina [SILURIDÆ], the preñadillas of the natives. They are small Siluroids, abundant in the lakes and torrents of the Andes, and have attracted considerable attention from the fact that Humboldt adopted the popular belief that they live in subterranean waters within the bowels of the active volcanoes in the Andes, and are ejected with streams of mud and water during eruptions, though he considered it singular that they were not cooked when vomited forth from craters or other openings. The explanation of their appearance during volcanic eruptions is that they are killed by the sulphuretted gases escaping during an eruption, and swept down by the torrents of water issuing from the volcano.

stýl-a-gāl-mā'-ic, a. [Gr. stylos=a pillar, and agalma=an image.]

Arch.: Performing the office of a column; as, a stylagalmaic figure. Used also substantively of a figure performing the office of a column.

stýl'-ar, a. [Eng. styl(e); ar.] Of or pertaining to a style; stilar.

stýl'-ās'-tēr, s. [Gr. stylos=a pillar, and astēr=a star.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Stylasteridæ (q. v.), formerly classed with the Corals, and made a genus of Oculinidæ.

stýl'-ās'-tēr-īd, s. [STYLASTERIDÆ.] Any individual of the family Stylasteridæ (q. v.).

stýl'-ās'-tēr'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. stylaster; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -īdæ.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A family of Hydrocorallinæ, with several genera, living principally at considerable depths in the warmer seas. The skeleton is a branched calcareous structure, with cup-like depressions, each with a central chamber, surrounded by secondary chambers, separated from each other by short partitions. The colony consists of two sets of zooids, the perfect ones inhabiting the central chambers, while the smaller ones are occupied by imperfect zooids, resembling tentacles in appearance. The cavities of the zooids communicate by canals in the skeleton, and the reproductive organs are in the form of fixed sporosacs, developed within sac-like cavities in the skeleton. One fossil genus, Distichopora, from the Tertiary of France.

stýl'-ate, a. [Eng. style (2); -ate.]

Bot.: Having a persistent style.

style (1), *stīle (1), s. [Fr. stile, style, from Lat. stilus=an iron-pointed pen used for writing on wax-tablets, a manner of writing. From the same root as sting, stimulus, stigma, &c.; Sp. & Port. estilo; Ital. stile.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A piece of iron or other material pointed at one end, used by the ancients for writing by scratching on wax-tablets. The other end was made blunt and smooth, and was used to make erasures. Hence,

2. A hard point for tracing, in manifold writing.

3. A pointed tool used in gravings.

4. Manner of writing with regard to language; the peculiar manner in which a person expresses his ideas or conceptions; the particular mode or form of expressing ideas in language which distinguishes one writer or speaker from another; the distinctive manner of writing characteristic of each author, or of each body of authors, allied as belonging to the same school, country, or epoch.

"Though an author's plan should be faultless, and his story ever so well conducted, yet if he be feeble or flat in style, destitute of affecting scenes, and deficient in poetical coloring, he can have no success."—Blair: Rhetoric, lect. 10.

5. Mode of presentation, especially in music or any of the fine arts; characteristic or peculiar mode of developing an idea or accomplishing a result; the peculiar manner in which an artist expresses his ideas; it is exhibited in his choice of forms and mode of treating them, and is determined in different ways, according to the changes of thought at different times and stages of its development. Besides the individual style, there is also a national style; as, the Egyptian, the Grecian styles of architecture. Each of the various branches of art has its peculiar style; as, the epic, lyric, and dramatic styles of poetry; the historical and the landscape styles of painting, &c.

"In quiet poems of simple narrative, where there are no speakers or scenery to set off the words, the forcible style of the drama might interfere with the unity of the poem, by attracting to the words the interest that should be concentrated on the narrative; and here a simple style may be desirable. Thus poetic style may be roughly divided into (1) the elevated, (2) the graceful, (3) the forcible, (4) the simple."—Abbott & Seeley: English Lessons for English People, 345.

6. The peculiar manner or mode of action characteristic of a performer of an art; as, the style of rowing of an oarsman, a batsman's style in cricket, a bad style of walking, &c.

7. External manner or fashion. Manner deemed elegant and appropriate in social demeanor; fashion; as, An entertainment is given in style.

8. Phrase of address or appellation; formal or official designation; title.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: A particular character as to the general artistic idea prevailing a building; as, the Gothic or Norman styles. [ARCHITECTURE.]

2. Chron.: The method of reckoning time with reference to the Julian and Gregorian calendars, Old Style being founded on the former and New Style on the latter. The Julian Calendar (q. v.) prevailed in Europe to A. D. 1582. Pope Gregory XIII. published the Gregorian Calendar [CALENDAR, II. 3], enacting that ten days should be deducted from the year 1582 by calling the day which by the Julian Calendar would have been Oct. 5, Oct. 15, 1582. The alteration took place that same day in Spain, Portugal, and part of Italy. In France and Lorraine the change was made on Dec. 10 [20]; in Holland, Brabant, Flanders, Artois, and Hainault on Dec. 15 [25] of the same year. In Switzerland the Roman Catholics adopted the new style in 1583 or 1584, as did those of Germany in 1584. The Danes did so in 1582, the Poles in 1586, the Hungarians in 1587, the German Protestant city of Marburg in Feb., 1682, the States of Utrecht on Dec. 1

[12], 1700, the other German Protestants about the same date. Till 1751 both the Julian, or Old Style, and the practice of commencing the legal year on March 25, subsisted in England. But by 24 Geo. II., c. 23, it was enacted:

1. That throughout all His Majesty's dominions in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America the supputation according to which the year of our Lord began on March 25 shall not be used after the last day of December, 1751, and that the first day of January next following shall be reckoned as the first day of the year 1752, and so on in all future years.

2. That . . . the natural day next immediately following September 2, 1752, shall be called and reckoned as the fourteenth day of September, omitting the eleven intermediate nominal days.

3. That the several years of our Lord 1800, 1900, 2100, 2200, 2300 . . . shall not be deemed bissextile or leap years . . . and that the years of our Lord 2000, 2400, 2800 . . . shall for the future be esteemed bissextile or leap years."

The difference between the Old and New Styles was progressive. Up to 1699 it was only ten days, after 1700 it was eleven, and after 1800 twelve days. The year 1751 had no January, February, March 1-24, and September had only nineteen days. (Nicolas: Chron. of Hist.)

3. Surg.: A pointed surgical instrument; a probe. ¶ For the difference between style and diction, see DICTION.

¶ Style of a court.:

Law: The practice observed by any court in its way of proceeding.

style (2), *stīle (1), s. [Lat. stylus, from Greek stylos=a pillar, a post.]

1. Bot.: The part of a pistil intermediate in position between the germen or ovary below and the stigma above. It is considered to be an elongation of the ovary, and morphologically the upper narrow part of a carpellary leaf supporting the stigma. It is not more essential to a pistil than a petiole is to a leaf, and in fact is often absent. It may be taper or thick, is generally terete, but may be angular, or thin, flat, and colored. Sometimes it is continuous with, and at others articulated with the ovary; as a rule it arises from the apex, but occasionally from the sides of the latter. Its surface is generally smooth, but in Compositæ, most Campanulaceæ, &c., it is densely covered with hairs called collectors, which in Lobeles become an indusium (q. v.). Sometimes styles so completely cohere that they look like one style with a plurality of stigmas. In fully describing the styles of a plant mention should be made of their number, length, figure, surface, direction, and proportion.

2. Dialing: The gnomon of a sun-dial.

style (3), s. [STYLE.]

style, v. t. [STYLE (1), s.] To entitle, to name, to designate, to denominate.

stýl'-ēt, s. [A dimin. of style (1), s., or a contract. of stiletto (q. v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: A style, or stiletto.

"Graven as with an iron stilet on his brow."—Miss Brontë: Villetta, ch. xx.

Surg.: A probe.

style'-wōrt, s. [Eng. style (2), and wort.]

Botany:

1. The genus Stylidium (q. v.).

2. (Pl.) The Stylidiaceæ (Lindley.)

stýl-id-ī-ā'-çē-æ, subst. pl. [Mod. Latin stylidi (um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

(Bot.) Styleworts; an order of Epigynous Exogens, alliance Campanales. Herbs or under-shrubs; the hairs, if present, sometimes glandular; leaves scattered, sometimes whorled, exstipulate, entire, their margins naked or ciliated. Pedicels of the flowers generally with three bracts; calyx superior, with two to six divisions, two-lipped or regular, persistent; corolla monopetalous, its limb generally irregular, with five to six divisions. Stamens two, filaments connate with the style into a longitudinal column; ovary with two, rarely with one cell, many-seeded. Fruit capsular. Swamp plants, chiefly from Australia. Known genera five, species 121. (Lindley.)

stýl-id-ī-ūm, s. [Mod. Latin, dimin. from Gr. stylos=a pillar. So named because the stamens and style are united.]

Bot.: Stylewort; the typical genus of Stylidiaceæ. Beautiful little plants with red, pink, violet, white, or yellow flowers, occurring in Australia and India. Many are cultivated in British greenhouses.

stýl'-ī-form, a. [Eng. style (1), s., and form.] Having the shape of or resembling a style, pin, or pen; styloid.

stýl-li'-na, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. stylus.]

[STYLE (1), s.]

Palæont.: The typical genus of Stylinaceæ (q. v.).

From the Oölite.

A. As adj.: Of or relating to style.

B. As substantive:

1. The art of forming a good style in writing.
2. A treatise on style.

stȳl'-īte, s. [Gr. stylitēs, from stylos=a pillar, a post.]

Eccles. Hist. (pl.): A class of anchorites in the early Church who took up their abode on lofty pillars, where the limited space obliged them to stand continually, protected only at the sides by lattice-work or railing, and exposed to the open sky. Their position was an attempt to realize the two fundamental ideas of Christian asceticism—separation from the things of earth, and aspiration after those of heaven. The first Stylite was Simeon, the Syrian (A. D. 390-459), who commenced this mode of life near Antioch, about A. D. 420, on a pillar six or seven cubits, the height of which was repeatedly increased, till at last it was thirty-six feet high. His life was one of great austerity. After his death the Stylites became numerous, and peculiar privileges were accorded to them. This method of penance was confined to the East; Gregory of Tours mentions one Stylite in the district of Treves, but adds that the Gallic bishop caused his pillar to be destroyed. [STONE-WORSHIP.]

stȳl-ō, prefix. [Gr. stylos=a pillar, a post.] Pillar-like; having processes or projections resembling small pillars; specif., in anatomy, of, belonging to, or attached to the styloid process of the temporal bone, as the stylohyoid muscle and ligament.

stȳl'-ō-bāt, †stȳl'-ō-bīte, s. [STYLOBATE.]

Min.: The same as GEHLENITE (q. v.).

stȳl'-ō-bāte, s. [Lat. stylobates, stylobata, from Gr. stylobatēs, from stylos=a pillar, and batēs=one who treads, from bainō=to go; Fr. stylobate.]

Arch.: The substructure of a Greek temple below the columns, sometimes formed of three steps, which were continued round the peristyle, and sometimes of walls raised to a considerable height, in which case it was approached by a flight of steps at one end.

stȳl'-ō-bā-tī-ōn, s. [STYLOBATE.]

Arch.: The pedestal of a column.

†stȳl'-ō-bīte, s. [STYLOBATE.]

stȳ-lōç'-ēr-ās, s. [Pref. stylo-, and Gr. keras=a horn; so called because the styles, which are persistent, resemble horns.]

Botany: An American genus of Hippomanæ. Leaves like those of the cherry laurel; fruit globose, said to be eatable.

stȳ-lōch'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from pref. stylo-, and Gr. ochos=anything which holds or bears.]

Zoöl.: A family of Dendrocœla (q. v.). They are swimming animals, having two small tentacles with eyes on them, as well as others on the head. They exist on the gulf-weed, and swim in a rapid and sinuous manner to attack their prey.

stȳl'-ō-dōn, s. [STYLODONTIDÆ.]

Palæont.: A genus of small Polyprodont Marsupials, found in the Middle Purbeck beds.

stȳl'-ō-dōn-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from pref. stylo-, and Gr. odontos (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A family of Ganoid Fishes, with a single genus, Tetragonolepis, from the Lias. Body rhombic or ovate; vertebrae not completely ossified; termination of vertebral column homocercal; fins with fulcra; maxillary in a single piece; jaws with several rows of teeth, the outer ones equal, styloform; dorsal fin very long, extending to caudal; branchiostegals many. (Günther.) In some classifications this genus is placed with the Dapedidæ, and in others with the Pycnodontidæ.

stȳl'-ō-grāph'-īc, stȳl'-ō-grāph'-īc-al, a. [Eng. stylograph(y); -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to stylography; used in stylography; as, a stylographic pen or pencil.

stylographic-pen, s. A pen of modern invention, in which the ink is contained in a reservoir forming the body of the pen, and flows through a minute aperture in a point resembling that of a style, through which plays a very fine wire.

stȳl'-ō-grāph'-īc-al-lȳ, adv. [Eng. stylographical; -ly.] In a stylographic manner; by means of stylography.

stȳ-lōg'-ra-phȳ, s. [Lat. stylus = a style, and Gr. (graphō) = to write.] The art of tracing with a style; a method of drawing, engraving, or writing with a style on cards or tablets.

stȳl'-ō-hȳ'-ōid, a. [Pref. stylo-, and Eng. hyoid (q. v.).]

Anat.: Pertaining to the styloid and hyoid processes.

stȳl'-ōid, a. [Gr. stylos = a pillar, and eidos = form, resemblance.]

1. Anat.: Pillar-like. There is a styloid process of the radius, one of the temporal bone, and one of the ulna.

2. Arch.: A descriptive term applied to small, columnar projections.

stȳl'-ō-līte, s. [Pref. stylo-, and Gr. lithos = a stone.]

Petrol.: A name given to certain columnar formations in limestones, dolomites, and marls, standing at right angles to the stratification, like "cone-in-cone" structure. They are probably due to crystallizing action.

stȳl'-ō-mās'-tōid, a. [Pref. stylo-, and Eng. mastoid (q. v.).]

Anat.: Pertaining to the styloid and mastoid processes. There is a stylo-mastoid artery and foramen.

stȳl'-ō-māx-il-lar-ȳ, a. [Pref. stylo-, and Eng. maxillary (q. v.).]

Anat.: Of or pertaining to the styloid processes and the jaw. There is a stylo-maxillary ligament.

stȳ-lōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. stylos=a pillar, and Eng. meter.] An instrument for measuring columns.

stȳ-lō-nȳch'-ī-a, s. [Pref. stylo-, and Gr. onyx (genit. onychos)=a claw.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Oxytrichidæ, with four species, living in salt, fresh, and stagnant water. Animalcules free-swimming, persistent in shape, encircled, ovate or elliptical, with hooks and setæ at the margin of the styles.

stȳ-lōph'-ōr-ūs, s. [Pref. stylo-, and Gr. phoros=bearing.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Trachypteridæ (q. v.), with a single species, Stylophorus chordatus, of which only one example is known. Length about eleven inches; ventrals absent; tail terminating in a very long, cord-like appendage. It was obtained between Cuba and Martinique, and has been transferred from the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, London, to the British Museum (Nat. Hist.), South Kensington.

stȳ-lōp'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. stylop(s); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: An aberrant family of Coleoptera, parasitic on hymenopterous insects. The females are viviparous, apterous, and larviform, living permanently in the bodies of their hosts; the males are winged and active, and live but a few hours, solely to propagate their kind. The mouth-organs of the latter are rudimentary; head short and broad, with curiously-forked antennæ; wings membranous and much expanded; the elytra do not serve as wing-covers, but are reduced to slender appendages which, in dried specimens become twisted, whence the name of the order in which they are sometimes placed. [STREPSIPTERA.] The females are very prolific, each hatching within her body many thousands of eggs, and the larvæ escape from a hole in a part of the parent projecting from the abdomen of the host. The family is widely distributed, and contains three genera: Stylops, Xenos, and Helechthrus.

†stȳl'-ō-pōd, stȳl'-ō-pō-dī-ūm, s. [Pref. stylo-, and Gr. pous (genit. podos)=a foot.]

Botany: Hoffman's name for the disk in Umbellifera, which is dilated, and covers the whole summit of the ovary.

stȳl'-ōps, s. [Greek stylos=a pillar, and opsis=appearance.]

Entom.: The type-genus of Stylopidae (q. v.).

stȳl'-ō-spōre, s. [Pref. stylo-, and Gr. sporos=a seed.]

Bot. (pl.): Tulasne's name for the naked spores in certain fungals.

stȳl'-ō-stē'-mōn, s. [Pref. stylo-, and Gr. stēmōn=a warp or woof.] [STAMEN.]

Bot.: An epigynous stamen.

stȳl'-ō-tē'-gī-ūm, stȳl'-ō-stē'-gī-ūm, s. [Prefix stylo-, and Gr. tegōs, stēgōs=a roof.]

Bot.: The whole mass of a corona (q. v.), as in Stapelia. Called also Orbiculus and Saccus.

stȳl'-ō-tȳp, stȳl'-ō-tȳp'-īte, subst. [Pref. stylo-, and Gr. typos=form; Sp. cañutillo=a small tube or pipe.]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral occurring in columnar crystals in Copiapo, Chili. Hardness, 3.0; specific gravity, 4.79; luster, metallic; color and streak, black. Composition: Sulphur 24.9; antimony, 31.6; copper, 28.2; silver, 8.0; iron, 7.3=100, which yields the formula 3(Cu,Ag,Fe)S+Sb₂S₃.

stȳl'-ūs, s. [Lat.] [STYLE (1), s.]

stȳ-phēl'-ī-a, s. [Greek styphelos=close, solid, hard, rough. Named from the habit of the plant.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Stypheliæ. Beautiful Australian and Tasmanian shrubs, with scattered, oblong or lanceolate leaves, and drooping red or green flowers. Some are cultivated in greenhouses. Styphelia adscendens, a small prostrate shrub, has a cranberry-like fruit which is sometimes eaten.

stȳ-phēl'-ī-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. stypheli(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Epacridaceæ, having a one-sided ovary and fruit.

stȳph'-nīc, a. [Eng. sty(ptic); ph(e)n(o); and suff. -ic.] Derived from phenol, and possessing astringent properties.

styphnic-acid, s. [OXYPICRIC-ACID.]

stȳph-nō-lō'-bī-ūm, s. [Gr. styphos=astringent, sour, and lobos=a lobe.]

Bot.: A synonym of Sophora (q. v.).

stȳp'-tēr-īte, s. [Greek stypteria=an alum, an astringent salt; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as ALUNOGEN (q. v.).

stȳp'-tīc, stȳp'-tīck, a. & s. [Fr. styptique, from Lat. stypticus; Gr. styptikos=astringent, from stypō=to contract, to draw together.]

A. As adjective:

1. Astringent; producing contraction.

"Fruits of trees and shrubs contain phlegm, oil, and an essential salt, by which they are sharp, sweet, sour, or styptic."—Arbuthnot: On Aliments.

2. Having the quality of stopping hæmorrhage; stopping the bleeding of a wound.

"The wound may be dressed with some styptic and antiseptic agent."—Field, March 6, 1886.

3. Restrictive.

B. As substantive:

1. An astringent.

2. A medicine or preparation employed for the purpose of stopping the flow of blood from a wound, &c.

¶ Styptics are of three kinds: Chemical, as a saturated solution of alum or sulphate of zinc; vital (increasing the vital powers), as acetic acid, which also acts chemically; and mechanical, as the employment of a sponge tent.

stȳp'-tīc-al, a. [Eng. styptic; -al.] The same as STYPTIC, A. (q. v.).

stȳp'-tī-çīte, s. [Eng. styptic; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in mamillary aggregations of delicate fibers, in Copiapo, Chili, and also in the department of Gard, France. Hardness, 1.5-2; specific gravity, 1.84; luster, silky; color, straw-yellow. Composition: Sulphuric acid, 29.30; sesquioxide of iron, 35.15; water, 35.55=100, which yields the formula 3Fe₂O₃·5SO₃+27H₂O. Known also under the name Fibroferite.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

stȳp-tiċ'-ī-tȳ, s. [English styptic; -ity.] The quality or state of being styptic.

"Cathartics of mercurials precipitate the viscidities by their stypticity, and mix with all animal acids."—Floyer: On Consumption.

stȳr-ā-cā'-ċē-æ, stȳr-rā'-ċē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. styrax, genit. styrac(is); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ, -eæ.]

Bot.: Storaxworts; an order of Perigynous Exogens, tribe Rhamnales. Trees or shrubs with alternate, generally toothed, exstipular leaves; flowers axillary, solitary, or clustered, with scale-like bracts; hairs often stellate; calyx with four or five divisions, imbricated, persistent; corolla monopetalous, its divisions often different from those of the calyx, imbricated in aestivation; stamens definite or indefinite; pollen broadly elliptical; style simple; stigma capitate; ovary generally inferior, with two to five cells, each with two or an indefinite number of seeds. Found in various parts of the tropics. Known genera six, species 115. (Lindley.)

stȳr'-ā-ċin, s. [Latin styrax, genit. styrac(is); -in.] [CINNYL-CINNAMATE.]

stȳr'-ā-ċöl, stȳr'-ā-ċōne, s. [Eng. styrac(in); -ol, -one.] [CINNYLIC-ALCOHOL.]

stȳr'-āx, s. [STORAX.]

Bot.: Storax; the typical genus of Styracaceæ (q.v.). Calyx campanulate, five-toothed, persistent; corolla monopetalous, deeply three to seven cleft; stamens ten, united at the base; anthers linear, two-celled; style simple; stigma three-lobed; ovary superior; ovules indefinite; fruit a drupe. Elegant trees and shrubs, mostly with stellate hairs, entire leaves, and racemes of white or cream-colored flowers. Found in the warmer parts of America and Asia; one is European and one African. Styrax officinale, a tree from fifteen to twenty feet high, has ovate leaves, shining above, downy beneath, longer than the racemes, which are simple, and consist of five or six flowers. It is a native of Syria, Greece, and Italy. It furnishes storax (q.v.), which exudes and hardens in the air when the bark is wounded. S. benzoin is the Benjamin Storax, or Gum-Benjamin tree. It has ovate, oblong, pointed leaves, glabrous above, downy beneath, only a trifle longer than the racemes, which are compound. It is found in Sumatra, Java, and the Malay Archipelago generally, and produces benzoin (q.v.). S. reticulata, S. ferruginea, and S. aurea yield a gum used as incense. Among other American species are S. grandiflorus, S. levigatus, and S. pulverulentus. S. serratum and S. virgatum, small trees, natives of Bengal, yield gum, but of inferior quality.

Stȳr'-ī-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to Styria, a province of Austria.

B. As subst.: A native of Styria.

stȳr'-öl, stȳr'-ö-lēne, s. [Eng. styr(ax), and (alcoh)ol; suff. -ene.] [CINNAMENE.]

stȳr'-ōne, s. [Eng. styr(ax); -one.] [CINNYLIC-ALCOHOL.]

stȳr'-ön-yl, s. [Eng. styron(e); -yl.]

Chem.: A compound radical consisting of phenyl, C_6H_5 , and ethyl, C_2H_5 .

styronyl-alcohol, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{10}O = C_6H_4(C_2H_5)OH$. Primary phenethyl alcohol. Obtained by the action of potassic hydrate on styronyl chloride. It boils at 225°.

styronyl-chloride, s.

Chem.: C_8H_9Cl . A liquid produced by the action of chlorine on boiling ethyl-benzene. It cannot be distilled without decomposition.

stȳr'-yl, s. [Eng. styr(ax); -yl.] [CINNYLIC-ALCOHOL.]

stȳr'-yl'-ā-mīne, s. [Eng. styryl, and amine.]

Chem.: $C_9H_{11}N = C_9H_9 \left\{ \begin{matrix} N \\ H_2 \end{matrix} \right\}$. Cinnylamine. A base produced by subjecting to heat to 100°, in a sealed tube, a mixture of styrylic chloride, ammonia, and absolute alcohol. It forms small, colorless crystals, which readily melt to a yellowish oil, is slightly soluble in water, very soluble in ether.

stȳr'-yl'-īc, a. [Eng. styryl; -ic.] Contained in or derived from styryl.

styrylic-alcohol, s. [CINNYLIC-ALCOHOL.]

styrylic-chloride, s.

Chem.: C_9H_9Cl . A light yellow oil, obtained by passing dry hydrochloric acid gas into crystallized styrylic alcohol, heating the product to 100°, and washing with dilute soda-lye. It smells of anise oil, remains liquid at -19°, and cannot be distilled, even in vacuum, without decomposition.

styrylic-oxide, s.

Chem.: $(C_9H_9)_2O$. A light yellow, viscid oil, produced by the action of boric anhydride on styrylic alcohol. It has the odor of cinnamon, is heavier than water, and is partly decomposed by distillation.

stȳr'-yl'-īne, s. [Eng. styryl; -ine.]

Chem.: C_9H_9N . Chiozza's name for a base which he obtained by treating metastyrol with ammonium sulphide.

stȳthe, s. [Etym. doubtful. Perhaps connected with stifle (q.v.).]

Mining: Choke-damp, or carbonic-acid gas.

stȳth'-ȳ, s. & v. t. [STITHY.]

Stȳx, s. [Gr.] [STYGIAN.]

Class. Mythol.: The principal river of the lower regions, which it encompassed seven times. It had to be crossed by the shades of the departed in passing to the region of spirits.

sū-ā-bīl'-ī-tȳ, s. [Eng. suable; -ity.] The quality or state of being suable; liability to be sued; the state of being subject by law to civil process.

sū-ā-ble, a. [Eng. su(e); -able.] Capable of being sued; liable to be sued; subject by law to civil process.

"Legacies out of lands are probably suable in chancery."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

suāde (u as w), v. t. [Latin suadeo.] To persuade.

"Flee thee ill swading pleasure's baits untrue."

Grinoald, in Tottel's Songs.

sū-æ-dā, s. [Arabic suæd=a kind of sea-blite (sec def.).]

Botany: Sea-blite; a genus of Chenopodiaceæ. Saline herbs or shrubs with semi-cylindrical leaves; flowers generally perfect, with two bracts at the base; calyx five-partite, without appendages or a wing at the back, often fleshy. Stamens five; style none; stigmas usually three; utricle inclosed in the calyx. Seed lenticular, crustaceous. Known species about thirty-three; from salt-marshes and sea-shores. Two are common in the temperate regions of Europe, Sueda maritima, the Annual, and S. fruticosa, the Shrubby Sea-blite; the first has two and the second has three styles. The first is an annual with the flowers generally solitary; it is smaller than the other species, and more common on the English sea-shores. S. fruticosa, S. indica, and S. nudiflora are found on the shores of India; their ashes furnish alkali.

suāge (u as w), swāge, v. t. [An abbrev. of assuage (q.v.).] To assuage.

"But wicked wrath had some so farre enraged,

As by no meanes theyr malice could be swaged."

Gascoigne: Fruites of Warre.

sū-ānt, sū-ēnt, a. [O. Fr. suant, suiant, pr. par. of suire=to follow.] [SUE.] *Even, uniform; spread equally over the surface.

sū-ānt-lȳ, adv. [English suant; -ly.] Evenly, equally, smoothly, regularly.

sū-ar'-rōw, s. [SAOUARI.]

sūā'-sī-ble (u as w), a. [Latin suasus, pa. par. of suadeo=to persuade.] Capable of being persuaded; easily persuaded.

sūā'-sion (u as w), s. [Fr., from Lat. suasionem, accus. of suasio, from suasus, pa. par. of suadeo=to persuade; Ital. suasione.] The act of persuading; persuasion.

"Thei had by the subtil suasion of the deuill, broken the thirde commaundment."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 157.

sūā'-sive (u as w), a. [Lat. suasus, pa. par. of suadeo=to persuade.] Having power to persuade; persuasive.

"Its command over them was but suasive and political."—South: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 2.

sūā'-sive-lȳ (u as w), adv. [Eng. suasive; -ly.] In a manner tending to persuade; persuasively.

sūā'-sōr-ȳ (u as w), adj. [Lat. suasorius, from suasus, pa. par. of suadeo=to persuade.] Tending to persuade; having the power of persuading; persuasive.

"There is a suasory or enticing temptation, that inclines the will and affections to close with what is presented to them."—Hopkins: On the Lord's Prayer, p. 123.

sūāve (u as w), adj. [Fr., from Latin suavis=sweet.] Agreeable in manners; bland, pleasant; blandly polite.

sūāve-lȳ (u as w), adv. [Eng. suave; -ly.] In a suave manner; with suavity; blandly.

sūāv'-ī-fȳ (u as w), v. t. [Lat. suavis=sweet, and facio (pass. fio)=to make.] To make affable or suave.

suā-vīl'-ō-quēt (u as w), adj. [Lat. suavis=sweet, and loquens, pr. par. of loquor=to speak.] Speaking suavely, blandly, or affably; using soft and agreeable speech.

suā-vīl'-ō-quȳ (u as w), s. [SUAUILOQUENT.] Sweetness or blandness of speech.

sūāv'-ī-tȳ (u as w), s. [Fr. suavité, from Lat. suavitatem, accus. of suavitas=sweetness; suavis=sweet; Sp. suavidad; Ital. suavità, soavità.]

*1. Sweetness to the taste.

2. Something pleasant or agreeable.

3. The quality or state of being suave; graciousness and pleasantness of manners; affability, agreeableness, blandness.

sūb (1), s. [Abbr. of substitute.] One who takes the place of an absentee; a substitute.

sūb (2), s. [Abbr. of subordinate.] A subordinate; a subaltern.

sūb-, pref. [Lat.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A Latin preposition, meaning literally, under, below. It is largely used as a prefix to English words, to denote an inferior position or intention, subordinate degree, some degree, and sometimes the least sensible degree of that expressed by the word to which it is prefixed. The b is frequently changed into the letter with which the next syllable begins, as in succinct, suggest, suppress, &c.

2. Chem.: A prefix used in compounds to denote that the metal is in excess of one atom of the negative element or acid radicle, e.g., Hg_2O , suboxide of mercury; $2Pb''(C_2H_3O_2)_2$, $Pb''O$, subacetate of lead.

Anat.: Situated under the acromion. There is a sub-acromial bursa.

sub-agency, s. A subordinate agency.

sub-agent, s.

Law: The agent of an agent.

sub-alate, a.

Bot.: Having a narrow wing or margin.

sub-almoner, subst. A subordinate or deputy almoner.

"Subdean of his Majesty's chappel . . . and sub-almoner to him."—Wood: Fasti Oxon., ii.

sub-angular, a. Slightly angular.

sub-Antichrist, subst. An inferior Antichrist. (Milton.)

sub-apical, a. Under the apex; of or pertaining to the part under the apex.

sub-aquaneous, a. Being or living under water; subaqueous.

Anat.: Situated under the arachnoid.

¶ Used of the space between the arachnoid and the pia mater.

sub-arborescent, a. Having a somewhat tree-like aspect.

sub-arctic, a. Applied to the region or climate next to the arctic; approximately arctic.

sub-base, sub-bass, s.

Music: A pedal register in the organ, of 32-feet tonic.

sub-beadle, subst. An inferior or subordinate beadle.

"They ought not to execute those precepts by simple messengers, or sub-beadles."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

sub-blush, v. i. To blush slightly.

"Sub-blushing as she did it."—Sterne: Tristram Shandy, vi. 174.

sub-bourdon, s. The same as SUB-BASE (q.v.).

sub-breed, s. A distinctly marked subdivision of a breed. (Darwin.)

sub-cartilaginous, a.

1. Situated under or beneath cartilage.

2. Partly cartilaginous or gristly.

sub-caudal, a. Being or situated under the tail.

sub-celestial, sub-cælestiall, a. Placed or being beneath the heavens or heavenly things.

"Even he [Solomon] passeth the same sentence of vanity, vexation and unprofitableness, upon this, as upon all other sub-celestial things."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 14.

1. Being or lying under the center.

2. Nearly, but not quite central.

sub-chanter, s. A deputy or under-chanter; the deputy of the precentor of a cathedral; a succentor (q.v.).

sub-class, s. A subdivision of a class, consisting of orders allied to a certain extent.

Min. & Petrology: Nearly columnar. Used of basalt, &c.

sub-committee, s. An under-committee; a part or subdivision of a committee appointed for special business.

"Their sequestrators and sub-committees abroad, men for the most part of insatiable hands, and noted disloyalty."—Milton: Hist. Eng., bk. iii.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, ċell, chorus, ċhin, bench; go, ġem; thin, tȳis; sin, aȳ; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; tȳion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

sub-compressed, adj. Partially or imperfectly compressed; not fully compressed.

sub-concave, a. Slightly concave.

sub-conformable, a. Partially conformable.

sub-conical, a. Slightly or partially conical.

1. Partially or imperfectly conscious.

2. Occurring without attendant consciousness. (Said of states of the mind.)

sub-constellation, subst. A subordinate or secondary constellation.

"The Pleiades, or sub-constellation upon the back of Taurus."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. v., ch. xix.

sub-contract, s. A contract under a previous contractor.

sub-contracted, a. Contracted after a former contract; betrothed for the second time.

"Your claim,
I bar it in the interest of my wife;
'Tis she is sub-contracted to this lord."

Shaksp.: Lear, v. 3.

sub-contractor, s. One who takes a portion of a contract from the principal contractor.

sub-contrary, a. & s.

A. As adj.: Contrary in an inferior degree. Specifically—

1. Geom.: Applied to two similar triangles when they are so placed as to have a common angle at the vertex and yet their bases not parallel. In such triangles the angles at the bases are equal, but on the contrary sides. Thus, the triangles ABC, ADE, are sub-contrary, and the angles ACB, AED, are equal to the angle ADE, ABC respectively.

2. Logic:

(1) A term applied to each of two particular propositions when one is affirmative and the other negative. Thus, "Some man is learned," "Some man is not learned," are sub-contrary propositions with respect to each other. Sub-contrary propositions cannot be both false, for then their contradictories, which are contrary propositions with regard to each other (in this case, "No man is learned," "All men are learned") would both be true. But, as in the examples given above, two sub-contraries may both be true.

(2) Applied to the relation between two attributes which coexist in the same substance, but in such a way that as one increases the other decreases.

B. As substantive:

Logic: A sub-contrary proposition.

Sub-contrary section:

Geom.: In any surface of the second order, if two planes be passed perpendicular to the same principal plane, but not parallel to each other, and so that the sections are similar, both the planes and the sections are sub-contrary with respect to each other.

sub-cordate, a. Somewhat cordate; somewhat resembling a heart in shape.

sub-costal, a. Situated or lying under the ribs.

Sub-costal muscles:

Anat.: Small muscles lying on the inner aspect of the thoracic wall close to the surface of the intercostals near the angles of the ribs.

sub-crystalline, a. Imperfectly crystallized.

sub-cylindrical, a. Imperfectly or somewhat cylindrical.

sub-dilated, a. Partially or imperfectly dilated.

Anat.: Situated under the dura mater. Applied to the space between the dura mater and the arachnoid.

sub-editor, s. The assistant editor of a newspaper, periodical, or other publication.

Zoöl.: Resembling the Red Deer (Cervus elaphus), especially in the formation of the antlers. The elaphine type of antler has the brow-tyne reduplicated, while the royal is developed at the expense of the tines, and much divided up in well-grown animals. In sub-elaphine Deer (the genera Pseudaxis and Dama) the relative proportion of the tynes is much the same, but the brow-tyne is quite simple.

sub-epidermal, a. Situated or lying immediately under the epidermis or scarf-skin, or outer bark.

sub-family, s.

Nat. Science: A grade between a family and a genus.

sub-feudation, s. The same as SUBINFEDATION (q. v.).

sub-feudatory, s. An inferior tenant who held a feud from a feudatory of the crown or other superior.

sub-fibrous, a. Somewhat or slightly fibrous.

sub-generic, a. Of or belonging to a sub-genus (q. v.).

sub-genus, s.

Nat. Science: A division of a genus consisting of species having common characteristics differing more or less from those of the type, but not of sufficient importance to entitle them to generic distinction.

sub-globose, a. Partially or imperfectly globose.

sub-governor, subst. An under or subordinate governor.

"The sub-governor general . . . might arrive in the sloop that was daily expected from Okotzk."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. vi., ch. v.

sub-group, s.

Nat. Science: A subdivision of a group.

sub-judice, phr. [Lat.=before the judge.] Not yet decided; undecided.

sub-kingdom, s.

Nat. Science: A grade between a kingdom and a class.

sub-lessee, s. The receiver or holder of a sub-lease.

sub-librarian, s. An assistant or under-librarian.

sub-lieutenant, subst. A subordinate or second lieutenant.

sub-marshal, s. A subordinate or under marshal.

sub-niveal, a. Situated or being under the snow.

"A favorite resort for these sub-niveal operations is a steep bank where the heather is old and long."—Field, Dec. 12, 1885.

sub-officer, s. An under or subordinate officer.

sub-orbital, sub-orbital, a. Seated beneath the orbital cavity.

sub-porphyrific, a. Allied to porphyry, but containing smaller and less distinctly marked points or crystals.

sub-reader, s. An under reader in the Inns of Courts.

sub-rector, subst. The deputy or substitute of a rector.

sub-region, s.

Geography: A division of a zoogeographical region founded on the distribution of families and genera. [REGION, II. 2.]

sub-religion, subst. A faith, doctrine, or belief approaching the sacredness of religion; an inferior religion.

sub-resin, s. That portion of a resin soluble only in boiling alcohol, and precipitated again as the alcohol cools, forming a kind of seeming crystallization.

sub-sizar, sub-sizer, s. An under-sizar; a student of lower rank than a sizar. (Cambridge Univ.)

Nat. Science: A grade immediately below a species. In the case of plants sub-species are often produced by cultivation, and when the characters are hereditarily transmitted with constancy through the seed, races arise.

"Now if we reflect on the weighty arguments above given for raising the races of men to the dignity of species, and the insuperable difficulties on the other side in defining them, it seems that the term sub-species might here be used with propriety. But from long habit the term 'race' will, perhaps, always be employed."—Darwin: Descent of Man (ed. 2d), p. 175.

sub-specific, a. Of or belonging to a sub-species (q. v.).

sub-spherical, adj. Partially or imperfectly spherical; of a form approaching a sphere.

Zoöl.: Partially spiral. Used spec. of the operculum of Melania, &c.

sub-treasurer, s. The officer in charge of a sub-treasury.

sub-treasury, s. A subordinate treasury, or place for deposit of government money.

sub-tribe, s.

Nat. Science: A grade immediately below a tribe.

sub-varietal, a. Of, belonging to, or having the characters of a sub-variety.

sub-variety, s.

Nat. Science: A grade next below a variety.

sūb, s. [See def.] "A colloquial contraction for a subordinate or substitute; an inferior officer, &c.; a subaltern; one who fills the place of another; specif. a printer who works in place of another."

sūb-āç'-īd, a. & s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. acid (q. v.).]

A. As adj.: Slightly acid, acrid, or sour.

"The juice of the stem is like the chyle in an animal body, not sufficiently concocted by circulation, and is commonly subacid in all plants."—Arbuthnot: Of Ali-ments, ch. iii.

B. As subst.: A substance moderately or slightly acid.

sūb-āç'-rīd, adj. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. acrid, (q. v.).] Somewhat or moderately acrid, sharp, or pungent.

"The green choler of a cow tasted sweet, bitter, sub-acrid, or a little pungent."—Floyer: On Consumption.

sūb-āç', v. t. [Lat. subactus, pa. par. of subigo =to subdue: sub=under, and ago=to bring.] To subdue; to reduce to any state.

"So thoroughly sub-acted, that he takes his load from God, as the camel from his master, upon his knees."—Bishop Hall: Of Content, § 19.

sūb-āç'-tion, subst. [Lat. subactio.] [SUBACT.] The act or process of reducing to any state, as of mixing two bodies completely, or beating anything to a powder. (Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 838.)

sūb-ā-cūte', adj. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. acute (q. v.).] Moderately acute; acute in a modified degree. (Lit. & fig.)

sū'-bā-dar, s. [SUBAH DAR.]

sūb-ā-ēr'-ī-āl, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. aërial (q. v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: Being or lying under the air or sky.

2. Geol.: Taking place or produced by the action of the atmosphere.

Geol.: Denudation produced by the action of the air on rocks exposed to its influence, as opposed to sub-marine denudation (q. v.). When the sun heats rocks, the component minerals expand to a different extent, and afterward, as they cool, contract differently. The alternations of heat and cold make rocks brittle; ice tends to split them; the carbondioxide of the air helps to decompose and weather them; the sand blast of the desert or of sand dunes scrubs them. The aggregate effect of these causes, continued through many ages, is very great. (Lyell.) Mr. Croll, in 1867 and 1868, and Mr. Geikie, in the latter year, estimated the whole amount of subaerial denudation over the hydrographical basin of the Mississippi at a foot in 6,000 years.

sūb-āç'-ī-tā'-tion, s. [Lat. subagitatio, from subagito=to get under one, to lie with illicitly.] Carnal knowledge; sexual intercourse.

sū'-bāh, soō'-bāh, s. [Hind. suba.] A province. (Anglo-Indian.) sū'-bāh-dar, soō'-bā-dar, s. [Hind. subadār.] The holder of a province; a provincial governor. (Anglo-Indian.) sū'-bāh-dar-ŷ, soō'-bāh-dar-ŷ, subst. [Hind. subadārī.] The office, dignity or jurisdiction of a subahdar (q. v.).

sūb-ā'id, v. t. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. aid (q. v.).] To give secret or private aid to; to aid secretly or in an underhand manner.

"To hold that kingdom from subaiding such,

Who else could not subsist."

Daniel: Civil War, viii.

sūb-āl'-pine, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. alpine.] Not quite alpine, though approaching it. Used in botany, &c., for the zone on a mountain side just below the alpine zone.

sūb-āl-tēr'n, sūb-āl-tēr'n, sub-al-terne, a. & s. [Fr. subalterne, from Lat. subalternus=subordinate, from sub=under, and alter=another.]

A. As adj.: Holding a subordinate or inferior position; subordinate, inferior; specif., in the army, being below the rank of captain.

"The subaltern officers must be selected among the Duinhe Wassels, proud of the eagle's feather."—Masaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: One who holds a subordinate or inferior position; specif., a commissioned officer below the rank of captain.

"How could subaltern like myself expect Leisure or leave to occupy the field?"

R. Browning: Luria, iii.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

2. Logic: A subaltern proposition.

"Two propositions are said to be opposed to each other, when, having the same subject and predicate, they differ in quantity or quality, or both . . . In ordinary language, however, and in some logical treatises, propositions which do not differ in quality (viz. subalterns), are not reckoned as opposed . . . In subalterns, the truth of the particular (which is called the subalternant) follows from the truth of the universal (subalternant), and the falsity of the universal from the falsity of the particular: . . . subalterns differ in quantity alone; contraries, and also subcontraries, in quality alone."—Whately: Logic, bk. ii., ch. ii., § 3.

subaltern-opposition, s.

Logic: The opposition which exists between a universal and a particular proposition of the same quality.

subaltern-propositions, s. pl.

Logic: Universal and particular propositions agreeing in quality, but not in quantity. Thus, Every vine is a tree, Some vine is a tree; and, No vine is a tree, Some vine is not a tree, are subaltern propositions.

subaltern-species (or genus), s.

Logic: That which is both a species of some higher genus, and a genus in respect of the species into which it is divided.

süb-âl-têrn'-ant, s. [Eng. subaltern; -ant.]

Logic: A universal as opposed to a particular. (See extract under Subaltern, B. 2.)

süb-âl-têr'-nate, a. & s. [Eng. subaltern; -ate.]

A. As adjective:

1. Successive; succeeding by turns.
2. Subordinate, subaltern, inferior.

"The service, maple, lime-tree, horn-beam, quick-beam, birch, hazel, &c., together with all their subaltern-ate and several kinds."—Evelyn: Silva, § 3. (Introd.)

B. As substantive:

Logic: A particular, as opposed to a universal.

süb-âl-têrn'-â-tîng, a. [SUBALTERNATE.] Succeeding by turns; subalternate.

süb-âl-têr'-nâ-tion, s. [SUBALTERNATE.] A state of subordination, inferiority, or subjection.

"So that woman being created for man's sake to be his helper, in regard of the end before mentioned, namely, the having and bringing up of children, whereunto it was not possible they could concur, unless there were subalternation between them, which subalternation is naturally grounded upon inequality."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity, bk. v., § 73.

süb'-ân-gled (le as el), a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. angled.] Somewhat angled.

Entom.: A European geometer moth, Acidalia prataria.

süb-âp'-ên-nine, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. Apen-nine.] Situated or being under or at the foot of the Apennine mountains.

subapennine beds, or series, s. pl.

Geol.: Older Pliocene beds constituting a range of low hills flanking both sides of the Apennine chain. They are about 3,000 feet thick, becoming more massive toward the south. They exhibit a finer development of the Pliocene than any other in Europe, and constitute its typical series. There are innumerable alternations of light-brown or gray calcareous and argillaceous marls. They are chiefly marine, but fluviatile or lacustrine strata also occur. There are many plants of the genera Pinus, Taxodium, Sequoia, Ilex, Quercus, Platanus, Prunus, Alnus, Ulmus, Ficus, Laurus, Cassia, Juglans, Acer, Betula, Rhamnus, Smilax, &c. The upper portion contains the mammalian remains of Mastodon arvernensis, Elephas meridionalis, Hippopotamus major, with species of the genera Ursus, Hyæna, Felis, &c.

süb-a-quât'-ic, süb-â'-quê-ous, a. [Lat. sub=under, and aqua=water.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Being, lying, or living under or beneath the surface of water.

"The northern naturalists will perhaps say, that this assembly met for the purpose of plunging into their subaqueous winter quarters."—Pennant: British Zoology; Swallows.

2. Geol. (of strata): Formed under water.

süb-ar'-cu-ât-êd, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. arcuate (q. v.).] Having a form resembling that of a bow; somewhat arcuate or incurved.

süb-âr-râ-tion, subst. [Lat. sub=under, and arrha=earnest money.] An old manner of betrothing; betrothal.

"By these tokens of spousage are to be understood rings, or money, or some other things to be given to the woman by the man; which said giving is called subarration, (i. e., wedding or covenanting), especially when it is done by the giving of a ring."—Wheatly: Common Prayer, ch. x., § 5.

süb-äs'-tral, a. [Lat. sub=under, and astrum=a star.] Beneath the stars or heavens; terrestrial.

"By the aid of improved astronomy he compares this subastral economy with the system of the fixed stars."—Warburton: Sermons, vol. ix., ser. ii.

süb-a-strin'-gent, adj. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. astrigent (q. v.).] Somewhat astringent; moderately astringent.

†süb-âud', v. t. [Lat. subaudio.] To understand or supply when an ellipsis occurs.

süb-âu-dî'-tion, s. [Lat. subauditio, from subauditus, pa. par. of subaudio=to understand or supply a word omitted; sub=under, and audio=to hear.] The act of understanding or supplying something not expressed; that which is understood or implied from what is expressed.

"This [egregious] has always now an ironical subauditio, which it was very far from having of old."—Trench: Select Glossary, p. 68.

süb-âx-il'-lar-ÿ, adj. [Pref. sub-, and English axillary (q. v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: Situated or placed beneath the armpit or the cavity of the wing.

2. Bot.: Situated under the axil formed by a petiole and a stem or branch, or by a branch with a stem.

süb-bräch'-i-âl, adj. [SUBBRACHIALES.] The same as Subbrachian, A. (q. v.)

*süb-bräch'-i-â-lêş, *süb-bräch'-i-â-tî, s. pl. [Pref. sub-, and Lat. brachiatum=with bows or branches like arms; brachium=an arm.]

Ichthy.: A group of Anacanthini, having ventral fins. Families, Gadidae and Pleuronectidae.

süb-bräch'-i-an, a. & s. [SUBBRACHIALES.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining or belonging to the group Subbrachiales (q. v.).

B. As subst.: Any individual of the group Subbrachiales.

süb-cäl-cär'-ê-ous, a. [Pref. sub-, and English calcareous (q. v.).] Somewhat or moderately calcareous.

süb-crâ'-nî-âl, adv. [Latin sub=under, and cranium=the skull.] Under the cranium or skull; as, the subcranial or pharyngeal arches.

süb-cu-tâ'-nê-ous, a. [Pref. sub-, and English cutaneous.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Situated under the skin; placed or performed under the skin.

"The subcutaneous injection of drugs."—London Daily Telegraph.

2. Anat.: Just below the cutis or skin. Applied to the platysma myoides muscle, &c.

subcutaneous-injection, subst. [HYPODERMIC INJECTION.]

subcutaneous-saw, s.

Surgery: A saw by which bony sections may be made without large incision in the flesh. It may be compared to a probe, a portion of whose length, at and toward the end, is flattened and serrated, so that being driven into the seat of its operations, it is reciprocated, so as to cut the bone without mangle the flesh to any serious extent.

subcutaneous-syringe, s.

Med.: An instrument for injecting medicinal solutions beneath the skin. It consists essentially of a tube with a piston for containing the preparation, and a perforated needle for piercing the skin and injecting the fluid. Also called a Dermopathic syringe.

süb-cu-tâ'-nê-ous-ly, adv. [Eng. subcutaneous; -ly.] Under the skin.

"One centigramme of pilocarpine was injected subcutaneously."—Pall Mall Gazette.

süb-cu-tîc'-u-lar, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. cuticle (q. v.).] Being under the cuticle (q. v.).

süb-dêa-côn, subst. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. deacon (q. v.).]

Eccles. & Ch. Hist.: The lowest step in holy orders in the Roman Church, the highest of the minor orders among the Greeks. In the Roman Church subdeacons prepare the sacred vessels and the bread and wine for mass, pour the water into the chalice at the offertory, and sing the Epistle; in the Greek Church they prepare the sacred vessels, and guard the gates of the sanctuary. There are no subdeacons in the Anglican Communion.

süb-dêa-côn-rÿ, *sub-dea-con-rie, süb-dêa-côn-shîp, subst. [Eng. subdeacon; -ry, -ship.] The order and office of subdeacon in the Roman Church.

süb-dêan, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. dean (q. v.); Lat. subdecanus.] The deputy or substitute of a dean; an under-dean.

"Being subdean . . . he undertook the entire management of all affairs."—Fell: Life of Hammond.

süb-dêan-êr-ÿ, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. deanery (q. v.).] The office and rank of a subdean.

"The subdeanery of York, founded anno 1229."—Bacon: Lib. Regis, p. 1,102.

süb-dê-câ'-nâl, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. decanal (q. v.).] Pertaining or relating to a subdean or subdeanery.

süb-dêc'-u-ple, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. decuple (q. v.).] Containing one part of ten.

süb-dêl'-ê-gate, subst. [Pref. sub-, and English delegate, s. (q. v.).] A subordinate or under delegate.

süb-dêl'-ê-gâte, v. t. [Pref. sub-, and English delegate, v. (q. v.).] To appoint to act as subdelegate, or under another delegate.

süb-dê-lêss'-ite, subst. [Pref. sub-, and English delessite.]

Min.: A name proposed for those varieties of delessite (q. v.) in which protoxide of iron predominates over the sesquioxide.

süb-dênt'-êd, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. dented.] Indented beneath.

süb-dê-pôş'-it, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. deposi (q. v.).] That which is deposited beneath something else.

*süb-dêr'-i-sör'-i-ous, a. [Pref. sub-, and Latin derisorius=serving for laughter, ridiculous.] [DERISION.] Ridiculing with moderation or delicacy.

"The subderisorous mirth is far from giving any offense to us; it is rather a pleasant condiment of our conversation."—More.

süb-dê-rîv'-a-tîve, s. [Pref. sub-, and English derivative (q. v.).] A word following another immediately in grammatical derivation; a word derived from a derivative, not from the root. Thus, manliness is a subderivative, being derived from manly, a derivative from man.

süb-dî-âc'-ôn-gate, s. [Pref. sub-, and English diaconate.] The office or rank of a subdeacon (q. v.).

*süb-dî'-âl, a. [Lat. subdialis=in the open air.] Of or pertaining to the open air; being under the open sky.

süb-dî'-a-lêct, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. dialect (q. v.).] A subordinate or inferior dialect; a less important dialect.

*süb-dî-chôt'-ô-mÿ, s. [Pref. sub-, and English dichotomy (q. v.).] A subordinate or inferior dichotomy or division into pairs; a subdivision.

süb-dis-tînc'-tion, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. distinction (q. v.).] A subordinate distinction.

*süb-dî-tî-tious, a. [Latin subdititius, from subditus, pa. par. of subdo=to substitute; sub=under, and do=to give.] Put secretly in the place of something else; foisted in.

*süb-dî-vêr'-sî-fÿ, v. t. [Pref. sub-, and English diversify (q. v.).] To diversify again what is already diversified.

"Variously subdiversified according to the fancy of the artificer."—Hale: Orig. of Mankind, p. 157.

süb-dî-vîde', v. t. & i. [Pref. sub-, and English divide (q. v.).]

A. Transitive: To divide the parts of into more or smaller parts; to put into subdivisions; to divide again, as that which has been already divided.

"Robert Stephens, a Frenchman, that curious critic and painful printer, some six score years since, first subdivided [chapters] into verses."—Fuller: Worthies; Kent.

*B. Intrans.: To be subdivided; to divide, separate, or part into subdivisions.

"A sect is sufficiently thought to be reprov'd, if it subdivides and breaks into little fractions, or changes its own opinions."—Bishop Taylor: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 22.

süb-dî-vîne', a. [Pref. sub-, and English divine, a. (q. v.).] Divine in a partial or lower degree.

"Given as some little glimpse of your subdivine natures."—Ep. Hall: Invisible World, bk. i., ser. ii.

süb-dî-vîş'-î-ble, a. [Pref. sub-, and English divisible (q. v.).] Capable or admitting of subdivision.

süb-dî-vî'-şion, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. division (q. v.).]

1. The act of subdividing or separating a part into smaller parts.

2. The part of anything made by subdivision; the part of a larger part.

"Separates itself into two correspondent subdivisions."—Knox: Essay 80.

bôil, bôÿ; pôut, jôwî; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; -tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -clous, -sious = şüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

sūb'-dō-loūs, adj. [Latin subdulus, from sub=under, and dulus=treachery, trick, fraud.] Deceitful, tricky, cunning, sly, crafty.

"They are the subtlest, I will not say the most subdulous dealers."—Hovell: Letters, bk. i., let. 41.

sūb-dōm'-in-ant, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. dominant (q. v.).] Music: The fifth below or the fourth above any key-note; the fourth note of the diatonic scale lying a tone under the dominant or fifth of the scale. Thus, in the scale of C, F is the subdominant, and G the dominant; in the scale of G, C is the subdominant, and D the dominant; &c.

sūb-dū'-a-ble, adj. [English subdu(e); -able.] Capable of being subdued; possible to be subdued. "I have a natural touch of enthusiasm in my complexion, but such as, I thank God, was ever governable enough, and I have found at length perfectly subduable."—More: Philosophical Writings (Pref. Gen.).

sūb-dū'-al, s. [Eng. subdu(e); -al.] The act of subduing. "He mistakes the consequences of these powers, which are the punishment of overt acts, and subdual of the passions; he mistakes them, I say, for powers themselves."—Warburton: Alliance.

sūb-dūce', sūb-dūct', v. t. [Lat. subduco, pa. par. of subductus, from sub=under, and duco=to lead, to draw.]

1. To withdraw, to take away.

"For never was the earth so peevish as to forbid the sun when it would shine on it, or to slink away, or subduce itself from its rays."—Hammond: Sermons, vol. iv., ser. 14.

2. To subtract by arithmetical operation; to deduct.

"If out of that supposed infinite multitude of antecedent generation, we should by the operation of the understanding subduce ten, whether we subduct that number of ten out of the last generation of men . . . the residue must needs be less by ten than it was before that subduction made."—Hale: Orig. of Mankind, p. 10.

sūb-dūc'-tion, s. [Lat. subductio, from subductus, pa. par. of subduco=to subduce (q. v.).]

1. The act of taking away; removal.

2. Arithmetical subtraction; deduction.

sūb-dūe', sub-dewe', sodue', soduw', sudew', v. t. [O. Fr. souduire=to seduce, from Lat. subduco=to draw away, to remove.] [SUBDUCE.]

1. To conquer and reduce to a state of permanent subjection. (It is a stronger term than conquer.)

"He had found it impossible to subdue the colonists, even when they were left almost unaided."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

2. To conquer by superior force; to obtain the victory over; to vanquish.

"He could never subdue the Israelites, unless they should be disobedient to their God."—Gilpin: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 7.

3. To overcome by discipline; to conquer; to bring under command; as, to subdue the passions.

*4. To prevail over, as by argument or entreaty; to overcome, as by kindness, entreaty, persuasion, or other mild means; to gain over.

"This virtuous maid subdues me quite."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, ii. 2.

*5. To reduce, to bring down, to lower.

"Nothing could have subdued nature

To such a lowness, but his unkind daughters."

Shakesp.: Lear, iii. 4.

6. To tone down, to soften; to make less glaring in tone or color. (Generally in the pa. par., as, to speak in subdued tones; a subdued light, &c.)

*7. To bring into cultivation; to make mellow; to break up.

"Nor is't unwholesome to subdue the land

By often exercise." May: Virgil: Georgics.

¶ For the difference between to subdue and to conquer, see CONQUER.

sūb-dūe', s. [SUBDUCE, v.] Conquest, subjugation.

"The world's subdue."—Greene: Looking-Glass, p. 119.

sūb-dūe'-ment, s. [Eng. subdue; -ment.] The act of subduing; conquest, subdual.

"Bravely despoiling forfeits and subduements."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, iv. 5.

sūb-dū'-ēr, s. [Eng. subdu(e); -er.] One who or that which subdues; one who conquers and brings into subjection; a conqueror, a vanquisher.

"Victor of gods, subducer of mankind."

Spenser: In Honor of Love, hymn i.

sūb-dūl'-cīd, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. dulcid (q. v.).] Somewhat sweet; moderately sweet.

sūb-dū'-ple, a. [Pref. sub-, and English duple (q. v.).] Containing one part of two.

"As one of these under pulleys doth abate half of that heaviness which the weight hath in itself, and cause the power to be in a subduple proportion unto it, so two of them do abate half of that which remains, and cause a subquadruple proportion, and three a subsextuple."—Wilkins: Mathematical Magic.

subduple-ratio, s. The ratio of 1 to 2, 3 to 6, &c.

sūb-dū'-pli-cate, a. [Pref. sub-, and English duplicate (q. v.).]

Math.: Expressed by the square root.

"The times are in subduplicate proportion to the length of the pendulums."—Boyle: Works, iii. 432.

subduplicate-ratio, s.

Alg.: The ratio of the square roots of a ratio. The subduplicate ratio of a to b, is the ratio of

$$\sqrt{a} \text{ to } \sqrt{b}; \text{ or } \sqrt{\frac{b}{a}}.$$ sūb-ē-lōh'-gate, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. elongate (q. v.).] Somewhat elongated; not fully elongated.

sūb-ē'-qual, adj. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. equal (q. v.).] Nearly equal.

sū-bēr-ām'-ic, a. [Eng. suberic (ic), and amic.] Derived from or containing suberic acid and ammonia.

suberamic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{12}O_2(HO)H_2N$. Produced by the dry distillation of ammonium suberate. It is fusible, soluble in boiling water, and deposited therefrom on cooling. (Watts.)

sū-bēr'-a-mīde, s. [Eng. suberic (ic), and amide.]

Chem.: $N_2(C_8H_{12}O_2) \cdot H_4$. A white crystalline substance, produced by the action of aqueous ammonia on methylic suberate.

sū-bēr-a-nīl'-ic, a. [Eng. suberic (ic); anil (ine), and suff. -ic.] Derived from or containing suberic acid and aniline.

suberanic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{12}O_2(HO)C_6H_5HN$. Produced by melting suberic acid with an equal volume of aniline, and recovered from the alcoholic filtrate obtained, after the separation of suberanilide. It crystallizes in microscopic laminae, melts at 128°, is slightly soluble in boiling alcohol. It dissolves easily in ether, and when fused with potash yields aniline.

sū-bēr-ān'-il-ide, s. [Eng. suberic (ic); anil (ine), and suff. -ide.]

Chem.: $C_8H_{12}O_2(C_6H_5)_2H_2N_2$. Is produced along with suberanic acid when suberic acid is melted with an equal volume of dry aniline. The product is dissolved in alcohol, from which the suberanilide crystallizes out in pearly laminae. It melts at 183°, and dissolves readily in boiling alcohol and in ether.

sū-bēr-āte, s. [Eng. suberic (ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of suberic acid (q. v.).

sū-bēr'-ē-ōūs, a. [Latin suber=cork.] Of the nature of cork; suberose.

sū-bēr'-ic, a. [Eng. suber; -ic.] Pertaining to cork; contained in or derived from cork.

suberic-acid, s.

Chemistry: $C_8H_{12}O_2(HO)_2$. An acid of the oxalic series, formed by the action of nitric acid on cork and various fatty bodies, as stearic and oleic acids. Oxalic acid is first removed from the product by cold water, and then leparglyic acid by treatment with cold ether. When further purified, it crystallizes in needles an inch long, or in hexagonal tables, melts at 140°, dissolves sparingly in cold water and ether, easily in alcohol and boiling water.

suberic-ether, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{12}O_2(C_2H_5O)_2$. Ethylic suberate. Obtained by passing hydrochloric acid gas into an alcoholic solution of suberic acid. It is a limpid liquid, having a faint odor and nauseous taste, boils at 230°, and mixes in all proportions with alcohol and ether. Specific gravity, 1.003.

sū-bēr-in, s. [Lat. suber=cork; -in.]

Chem.: Cellulose from cork.

sū-bēr-ite, a. & s. [SUBERITES.]

A. As adj.: Belonging to or resembling the genus Suberites, or the family Suberitidae (q. v.).

B. As subst.: Any individual of the genus Suberites, or the family Suberitidae (q. v.).

sū-bēr-ī'-tēs, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. suber=a cork.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Suberitidae (q. v.).

sū-bēr-īt-i-dā, s. pl. [Modern Lat. suberit (es); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idā.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A family of Monaxonida (approximately=the Monaxonidae (q. v.) of Schmidt). The spicules are pin-shaped, densely aggregated in fibers or matted. A. As adjective:

*1. Placed, situated, or being under; lower in position.

"An hilles side which did to her bewray
A little valley subject to the same."

Spenser: F. Q., III. vii. 4.

2. Being under the power, control, or authority of another.

"For all that lives is subject to that law;
All things decay in time, and to their end doe drawe."

Spenser: F. Q., III. ii. 40.

3. Exposed, liable, obnoxious.

"Subject and servile to all discontents."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 1, 161.

4. Being that on which anything operates, whether material or intellectual; as, the subject matter of a discourse.

*5. Submissive, obedient.

"Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers."—Titus iii. 1.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who is placed under the power, control, authority, or dominion of some one else; specif., one who owes allegiance to a sovereign, and is governed by his laws; one who lives under the protection of, and owes allegiance to a government.

"To serve me well, you all should do me duty, Teach me to be your queen, and you my subjects."

Shakesp.: Richard III., i. 3.

2. One who or that which is subjected, exposed, or liable to something; a person as the recipient of certain treatment.

"I am too mean a subject for thy wrath."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., i. 3.

3. One who or that which is the cause or occasion of something.

"I am the unhappy subject of these quarrels."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, v.

4. That which is snbjected or submitted to any physical operation or process; specif., a dead body used for purposes of dissection.

"It is no longer that temple; it is not even a corpse; it has become a subject."—G. H. Lewes: Aristotle, p. 161.

5. That on which any mental operation is performed; that which is spoken of, written of, thought of, or otherwise treated or handled; a theme.

"And could discriminate and argue well On subjects more mysterious."

Cowper: Task, v. 289.

6. The hero of a piece; the person treated of; the principal character.

II. Technically:

1. Art: The incident chosen by an artist; the design of a composition or picture; anything which constitutes the design or aim of any work of art.

2. Gram.: That which is spoken of; the person or thing of which anything is affirmed; the nominative of a verb.

"Moreover, his sentences occasionally have no subject and no principal verb."—Pall Mall Gazette.

3. Logic: That term of a proposition of which the other is affirmed or denied. One of the two terms by which (in conjunction with the copula) a proposition is constructed. Of these two, it is the name of that object of thought concerning which the statement is made. The corresponding term (i. e., the word which delivers what the statement is), is the predicate. The copula tells us whether the two are or are not in agreement. In the statements A is B, two A is not B, A is the subject, B the predicate, is or is not the copula.

4. Music: The theme or principal phrase of any movement, from which all the subordinate ideas spring or are developed. In sonata form there should be two chief snbjects, called first and second; in rondo form one is sufficient. In a fugue the snbject is called also the exposition, dux, proposition.

5. Philosophy:

(1) The Ego (q. v.), as distinguished from the object, or non-Ego; the mind considered as that in which knowledge inheres. [(2).]

"All knowledge is a relation, a relation between that which knows (in scholastic language the subject in which knowledge adheres) and that which is known (in scholastic language the object about which knowledge is conversant) and the contents of every act of knowledge are made up of elements, and regulated by laws, proceeding partly from its object and partly from its subject. . . . But philosophy being the science of knowledge, and the science of knowledge supposing, in its most fundamental and thoroughgoing analysis, the distinction of the subject and object of knowledge, it is evident that to philosophy the subject of knowledge would be by preëminence the subject, and the object of knowledge the object. It was therefore natural that the object and objective, the subject and subjective, should be employed by philosophers as simple terms, compendiously to denote the grand discrimination about which philosophy was constantly employed, and which no others could be found so precisely and promptly to express."—Hamilton: Reid's Works. (Note B.)

(2) (See extract under Substratnm.)

subject-matter, s. The matter or thought submitted for consideration or treatment in a discussion, discourse, or statement.

"As to the subject-matter, words are always to be understood as having a regard thereto; for that is always supposed to be in the eye of the legislator, and all his expressions directed to that end."—Blackstone: Comment. § 3. (Introd.)

süb-jěct', sub-get, sub-iecte, v. t. [SUBJECT, adj.]

1. To bring into snbjection; to bring under power, dominion, or control; to subdue, to reduce.

"God in judgment just Subjects him from without to violent lords."

Milton: P. L., xii. 93.

*2. To make subservient.

"Subjected to his service angels' wings."

Milton: P. L., ix. 155.

*3. To put, place, or lay under.

"In one short view, subjected to our eye, Gods, emp'rors, heroes, sages, beauties lie."

Pope: Moral Essays, v. 33.

4. To expose; to make liable or obnoxious.

"If the vessels yield, it subjects the person to all the inconveniences of an erroneous circulation."—Arbuthnot.

*5. To submit, to offer.

"God is not bound to subject his ways of operation to the scrutiny of our thoughts, and confine himself to do nothing but what we must comprehend."—Locke.

süb-jěct-dōm, s. [Eng. subject, s.; -dom.] The state or condition of being a subject.

"No clue to its nationality except in the political sense of subjectdom, therefore is available."—Greenwell: British Barrows, p. 608.

süb-jěct'-ěd, pa. par. & a. [SUBJECT, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

1. The act of subjecting or subdning; the act of vanquishing and bringing under the power, authority, or dominion of another.

"After the conquest of the kingdom, and subjection of the rebels."—Hale.

2. The state of a subject; the state or condition of being under the power, control, or authority of another.

"Such as refnse

Subjection to his empire tyrannous."

Milton: P. L., xii. 32.

süb-jěct-ist, s. [Eng. subject; -ist.] One versed in subjectivism; a subjectivist.

süb-jěct'-ive, a. [Latin subjectivus; Fr. subjectif.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Pertaining or relating to a snbject in a political sense.

*2. Obedient, submissive.

II. Technically:

1. Literature and Art: Applied to a production characterized by the prominence given to the individuality of the author or artist.

2. Metaph.: Relating to the subject, as opposed to the object.

"It will be well once for all to explain the modern use of the words subject and object—subjective and objective. The subject is the mind that thinks; the object is that which it thinks about. A subjective impression is one which arises in and from the mind itself; an objective arises from observation of external things. A subjective tendency in a poet or thinker would be a preponderating inclination to represent the moods and states of his own mind; whilst the writer who dwells most upon external objects, and suffers us to know little more of his own mind than that it has the power to reproduce them with truth and spirit, exhibits an objective bias."—Thomson: Laws of Thought, § 14.

subjective-method, s.

Philosophy: The method of investigation which molds realities on its conceptions, endeavoring to discern the order of things, not by step-by-step adjustments of the order of ideas to it, but by the anticipatory rush of thought, the direction of which is determined by thoughts and not controlled by objects. (G. H. Lewes: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), p. xxxiii.)

subjective symptoms, s. pl. Pathol.: Snch symptoms as are complained of by the patient, as distinct from objective symptoms, which are those apparent to the physician.

süb-jěct'-ive-lŷ, adv. [English subjective; -ly.] In a snbjective manner; in relation to the snbject; as existing in a subject or mind.

"The name of God taken subjectively is to be understood of Christ."—Pearson: On the Creed, art. 2.

süb-jěct'-ive-nēss, s. [Eng. subjective; -ness.] The quality or state of being subjective; subjectivity.

süb-jěct'-iv-izm, s. [Eng. subjectiv(e); -ism.]

Philosophy:

1. The doctrine that human knowledge is, in its constitution, purely snbjective, and therefore relative; and that objective truth can never be predicated of it.

"These men were followed by a younger generation of Sophists, who perverted the philosophical principle of subjectivism more and more till it ended in mere frivolity."—Ueberweg: Hist. Philos. (Eng. ed.), i. 72.

2. The doctrine of Kant as to the relativity of hman knowledge. His teaching on the subject is thns snmmarized by Lewes (Hist. Philos., ed. 1880, pp. 518, 517.)

(1) A knowledge of things per se (Dinge an sich) [= Noumena] is impossible, so long as knowledge remains composed as at present; consequently Ontology, as a science, is impossible.

(2) The existence of an external world is a necessary postulate, but its existence is only logically affirmed.

(3) Our knowledge, though relative, is certain. We have ideas independent of experience, and these ideas have the character of universality and necessity. Although we are not entitled to conclude that our subjective knowledge is completely true as an expression of the objective fact, yet we are forced to conclude that within its own sphere it is true.

bōil, bōy; pōūt, jōwī; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.

süb-lŷ-māte, v. t. [Lat. sublimatus, pa. par. of sublimo=to raise, to elevate; sublimis=raised, sublime (q. v.).]

1. Lit.: To bring a solid substance, as camphor or sulphur, by heat into the state of vapor which, on cooling, returns to the solid state. [SUBLIMATION.]

*2. Fig.: To refine and exalt; to heighten, to elevate.

"And as his actions rose, so raise they still their vein
In words, whose weight best suits a sublimated strain."

Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 4.

sub-lŷm-ate, s. & a. [SUBLIMATE, v.]

A. As substantive:

Chem.: The result of the process of sublimation; a body obtained in the solid state from the cooling of its vapor, e. g., sulphur, iodine, sal-ammoniac, mercuric chloride (corrosive sublimate).

*B. As adj.: Sublimated, brought to a state of vapor by heat, and again condensed.

¶ Blue sublimate, Corrosive sublimate: [CORROSIVE.]

süb-lŷ-mā'-tion, s. [SUBLIMATE.]

1. Lit. & Chem.: An operation by which a solid body is changed by heat into vapor, and then condensed into the solid form again.

*2. Fig.: The act of heightening, refining, and exalting; that which is highly refined, purified, or improved.

"She turns Bodies to spirits by sublimation strange."

Davies: Immort. of the Soul, s. 4.

sublimation-theory, s.

Geol.: The hypothesis that mineral veins, or many of them, have been filled by sublimation. Volatile substances occur both in hot springs and in the gaseous emanations of volcanoes, and might furnish certain constituents for ores and other minerals occurring in veins.

süb-lŷ-mā-tŷr-ŷ, sub-lŷ-ma-tor-ie, s. & a. [Lat. sublimatorium, from sublimatus=sublimate (q. v.).]

A. As subst.: A vessel used by chemists in the process of sublimation.

"Viols, croslettes, and sublimatories."

Chaucer: C. T., 16,261.

B. As adj.: Tending to sublimate; used in the process of sublimation.

"These [sulphur, mercury, &c.] will rise together in sublimatory vessels."—Boyle: Works, iii. 96.

süb-lime', a. & s. [Fr., from Lat. sublimis=lofty, raised on high; ultimate etym. uncertain; Sp. & Ital. sublime.]

A. As adjective:

*1. High in place or position; exalted, raised aloft, elevated.

"Sublime on these a tow'r of steel is rear'd."

Dryden. (Todd.)

*2. Haughty.

"With countenance sublime and insolent."

Spenser: F. Q., V. viii. 30.

†3. High in excellence; exalted above other men by lofty or noble qualities or endowments.

4. Striking the mind with a sense of grandeur or power, physical or moral; expressive of or calculated to excite feelings of awe, veneration, heroic and lofty feeling, and the like; lofty, grand, noble.

5. Lofty of mien; elevated in manner or expression.

"His fair large front and eye sublime declared Absolute rule."

Milton: P. L., iv. 300.

*6. Elevated by joy; elate, excited.

"Their hearts were jocund and sublime, Drunk with idolatry, drunk with wine."

Milton: Samson Agonistes, 1,669.

B. As subst. (with the def. article): That which is sublime; as—

1. Something lofty or grand in style.

"The sublime is a certain eminence or perfection of language."—Smith: Longinus; On the Sublime.

2. That which is grand and awe-inspiring in the works of nature or art, as distinguished from the beautiful.

¶ Hamilton (Metaph., ed. Mansel, ii. 512-16) thus distinguishes between the sublime and the beautiful: "The feeling of pleasure in the sublime is essentially different from our feeling of pleasure in the beautiful. The beautiful awakens the mind to a soothing contemplation; the sublime rouses it to strong emotion. The beautiful attracts without repelling; whereas the sublime at once does both; the beautiful affords us a feeling of unmingled pleasure, in the full and unimpeded activity of our cognitive powers; whereas, our feeling of sublimity is a mingled one of pleasure and pain—of pleasure in the consciousness of the strong energy, of pain in the consciousness that this energy is vain. . . . That we are at once attracted and repelled by sublimity arises from the circumstance that the object which we call sublime is proportioned to one of our faculties, and disproportioned to another; but as the degree of pleasure transcends the degree of pain, the power whose energy is promoted must be superior to that power whose energy is repressed."

He then proposes, instead of the ordinary division of the Sublime into the Theoretical and Practical (or, according to Kant, the Mathematical and Dynamical), a three-fold division: (1) The Sublime of Extension or Space; (2) Protension, or Time; (3) Intension, or Power; and quotes the following passage from Kant as an admirable example of the sublime in all its three forms:

"Two things there are, which, the oftener and the more steadily we consider them, fill the mind with an ever new, an ever rising admiration and reverence—the Starry Heaven above, the Moral Law within. Of neither am I compelled to seek out the reality, as veiled in darkness, or only to conjecture the possibility, as beyond the hemisphere of my knowledge. Both I contemplate lying clear before me, and connect both immediately with my consciousness of existence. The one departs from the place I occupy in the outer world of sense; expands beyond the bounds of imagination this connection of my body with worlds lying beyond worlds, and systems blending into systems; and protends it into the illimitable times of their periodic movements—to its commencement and continuance. The other departs from my invisible self, from my personality, and represents me in a world, truly infinite indeed, but whose infinity can be tracked out only by the intellect, with which also my connection, unlike the fortuitous relation I stand in to all worlds of sense, I am compelled to recognize as universal and necessary. In the former, the view of a countless multitude of worlds annihilates, as it were, my importance as an animal product, which, after a brief and that incomprehensible endowment with the power of life, is compelled to refund its constituent matter to the planet—itself an atom in the universe—on which it grew. The aspect of the other, on the contrary, elevates my worth as an intelligence even without limit; and this through my personality, in which the moral law reveals a faculty of life independent of my animal nature, nay, of the whole material world; at least, if it be permitted to fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr. rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

infer as much from the regulation of my being, which a conformity with that law exacts; proposing as it does, my moral worth for the absolute end of my activity, conceding no compromise of its imperative to a necessitation of nature, and spurning in its infinity, the conditions and boundaries of my present transitory life."

Hamilton adds: "Here we have the extensive sublime in the heavens and their interminable space, the protensive sublime in their illimitable duration, and the intensive sublime in the omnipotence of the human will as manifested in the unconditional imperative of the moral law."

sublime-geometry, subst. A name given by the older mathematicians to the higher parts of 'geometry, in which the infinitesimal calculus, or something equivalent, was employed.

Sublime Porte, s. [PORTE, ¶.]

süb-lime', v. t. & i. [Lat. sublimo, from sublimis = sublime (q. v.); Fr. sublimer.]

A. Transitive:

*1. To raise on high; to elevate.

"Although thy trunk be neither large nor strong,
Nor can thy head, not help'd, itself sublime
Yet, like a serpent, a tall tree can climb."
Denham: Old Age, 550.

†2. To exalt, to heighten, to raise, to improve.

"His very selfishness therefore is sublimed into public spirit."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

*3. To sublimate.

"Thundering Ætna, whose combnstable
And fuel'd entrails thence conceiving fire, Sublimed with mineral fury, aid the winds."
Milton: P. L., i. 235.

*4. To digest, to concoct.

"Th' austere and ponderous juices they sublime,
Make them ascend the porous soil and climb
The orange tree, the citron, and the lime."
Blackmore: Creation, ii.

B. Intrans.: To be susceptible of sublimation; to be brought or changed into a state of vapor by heat, and then condensed by cold, as a solid substance.

"The particles of sal ammoniac in snblimation carry up the particles of antimony, which will not sublime alone."—Newton: Opticks.

süb-limed', pa. par. & a. [SUBLIME, v. t.]

sublimed-sulphur, s. [SULPHUR.]

süb-lime'-ly, adv. [Eng. sublime, a.; -ly.] In a sublime manner; with lofty or elevated conceptions; grandly, nobly.

"Thus shone his coming, as sublimely fair,
As bonnded natnre has been framed to bear."
Parnell: Gift of Poetry.

süb-lime'-ness, s. [Eng. sublime; -ness.] The quality or state of being sublime; sublimity.

"Strength of reasoning and sublimeness of thought."—Burnet: Hist. Own Time.

süb-lim-i-fī-cā'-tion, s. [Lat. sublimis=sublime, and facio=to make.] The act of making sublime; the state of being made sublime.

"The poet has great advantages over the painter, in the process of sublimification, if the term may be allowed."—Gilpin.

süb-lim-i-tā'-tion, s. [Pref. sub-, and English limitation (q. v.).] A subordinate or secondary limitation.

süb-lim-i-tý, s. [Fr. sublimité, from Lat. sublimitatem, accus. of sublimitas, from sublimis=sublime (q. v.); Sp. sublimitad; Ital. sublimità.]

1. The quality or state of being sublime; that quality or character of anything which marks it as sublime; as—

* (1) Height of place or position; local elevation.

(2) Height in excellence; moral grandeur; loftiness of nature or character.

"Being held with admiration of their own sublimity and honor."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity, bk. i., § 4.

(3) Loftiness of conception, sentiment, or style.

"Milton's distinguishing excellence lies in the sublimity of his thoughts, in the greatness of which he triumphs over all the poets, modern and ancient, Homer only excepted."—Addison: Spectator, No. 279.

(4) Grandeur, vastness, majesty, whether of works of nature or of art; as, the sublimity of scenery.

2. That which is sublime; a sublime person or thing.

"The particle of those sublimities
Which have relapsed to chaos."

Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 54.

*3. The sublimest, supreme, or highest degree of anything; the height.

"The sublimity of wisdom is to do those things living which are to be desired when dying."—Jeremy Taylor: Holy Living and Dying.

4. The emotion produced by that which is sublime; a feeling produced by the contemplation of great or grand scenes and objects, or of exalted excellence; a mingled emotion of astonishment and awe excited by the contemplation of something sublime.

süb-lín-ě-ā'-tion, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. lineation (q. v.).] The mark of a line, or lines, under a word or sentence; underlining.

"I have compared his transcription, in which he hath made use of sublineation in lieu of asterisks."—Letter to Archbishop Usher, p. 564.

süb-lín'-gual (u as w), a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. lingual (q. v.).]

1. Anat.: Situated or being under the tongue; as, the sublingual gland, the sublingual artery.

*2. Pathol.: Placed under the tongue.

"These subliming humors should be intercepted, before they mount to the head, by sublingual pills."—Harvey.

sublingual-gland, s.

Anat.: The smallest of the three salivary glands. It is situated along the floor of the mouth, where it forms a ridge between the tongue and the gums of the lower jaw, covered only by the mucous membrane.

süb-lí'-tion, s. [Lat. sublitus, pa. par. of sublino=to smear, to lay on as a ground color.]

Paint.: The act or art of laying the ground color under the perfect color.

süb-lít'-tór-al, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. littoral (q. v.).] Under the shore.

süb-lób'-u-lar, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. lobule.] Situated under a lobe or lobule; as, the sublobular veins of the liver.

süb-lú'-nar, adj. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. lunar (q. v.).] Situated beneath the moon; sublunary.

"Now had night measnred with her shadowy cone Half way up hill this vast sublunar vanit."
Milton: P. L., iv. 777.

süb-lú'-nar-ý, *süb'-lú'-nar-ý, a. & s. [Eng. sublunar; -y.]

A. As adjective:

1. Situated beneath the moon.

"Man, like this sublunary world, is born
The sport of two cross planets, love and scorn."
Shelburne: The Microcosm.

2. Pertaining to this world; terrestrial, earthly, worldly.

"To seek no sublunary rest beside."
Cowper: Tc sk, v. 476.

B. As subst.: Any worldly thing.

"These sublunaries have their greatest freshness plac'd in only hope."—Feltham: Resolves, pt. ii., res. 66.

süb-lux-ā'-tion, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. luxation (q. v.).]

Surg.: An incomplete or partial luxation; a sprain.

süb-mām'-mar-ý, adj. [Pref. sub-, and English mammary (q. v.).] Situated or being under the mammae or paps.

süb-mar'-gin-al, a. [Prefix sub-, and English marginal (q. v.).]

Bot.: Situated near the margin.

süb-mar-rine', a. & s. [Pref. sub-, and English marine (q. v.).]

A. As adj.: Situated, being, existing, acting, or growing at some depth beneath the surface of the sea; remaining or acting at the bottom or under the surface of the sea.

"By the appellation of submarine regions it is not to be supposed that the places so called are below the bottom of the sea, but only below the surface of it."—Boyle: Works, iii. 342.

B. As subst.: A submarine plant.

submarine-battery, s. A vessel capable of being submerged and maintained at a given depth below the surface of the water, and provided with means for penetrating the hull of an enemy's ship below the water-line, or of blowing her up—usually a torpedo arrangement, which may be detached from the battery and attached to the bottom of the ship.

submarine-boat, s.

Naut.: A boat capable of being propelled under the water. The first was probably that constructed by Drebbel, a Dutchman, for James I., and Robert Fulton made an effort in the same direction in 1801. Among recent submarine boats, the most noteworthy is the Holland submarine torpedo-boat, which on her trial trip off Sandy Hook in the spring of 1898 made a run under water from Old Orchard Light, in The Lower Bay, to East Point Buoy, a distance of more than a mile and a half, in a little less than thirteen minutes. From the moment the vessel went down until she emerged at East Point Buoy, there was not a sign on the surface of the water to indicate her whereabouts.

submarine-cable, s.

Telegr.: A wire, or combination of wires, protected by flexible non-conducting water-proof material, designed to rest upon the bottom of a body of water, and serve as a conductor for the currents transmitted by an electro-magnetic telegraphic apparatus.

submarine-denudation, s.

Geol.: Denudation produced by the action of marine currents on the bed of the sea. Though during storms the sea is agitated only to the depth of a few fathoms from the surface, yet extensive currents can operate at greater depths; besides which the now existing depth of particular portions of the sea may have been much less at some former periods. The amount of denudation which takes place on the sea cliffs is probably only an insignificant fraction of the whole volume of marine denudation. (Lyell.)

submarine-forest, s.

Geol.: The remains of a forest beneath the present level of the sea. Such a forest exists along the northern shore of Fifeshire, Scotland, and beyond that area. It consists of a peat bed, with the roots, leaves, and branches of trees. The Rev. Dr. Fleming attributed it to the encroachment of the sea; Lyell (Princ. of Geol., ch. xx.) thought that it more probably arose from subsidence. A smaller forest of oak, yew, &c., with their trunks and roots as they grew, occurs at the mouth of the Parret in Somersetshire, England. It was described by Mr. Leonard Horner in 1815, and attributed by him to subsidence. (Ibid. ch. xx.) A forest beneath the sea-level at Bournemouth, discovered by Mr. Charles Harris in 1831, is believed to have reached the present low level by the encroachment of the sea. (Ibid. ch. xlviii.) Many others are known.

submarine-lamp, s. A lamp designed to burn and show light under water.

submarine-telegraph, s. [TELEGRAPH.]

submarine-torpedo, s. [TORPEDO.]

submarine-valve, subst. A port or valve in the side of a vessel, opening beneath the surface of the water, for the purpose of protruding a torpedo, the muzzle of a gun to be fired under water, or some other offensive weapon.

submarine-volcano, s. [VOLCANO.]

süb-māx-il'-lar-ý, a. [Pref. sub-, and English maxillary (q. v.).] Situated or being under the jaw.

submaxillary-gland, s.

Anat.: One of the three salivary glands. It is situated immediately below the base and the inner surface of the inferior maxilla.

süb-mē'-dī-al, süb-mē'-dī-an, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. medial, median (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Lang.: Situated or being under the middle.

II. Geol.: Of or belonging to the so-called Transition rocks (q. v.).

süb-mē'-dī-ant, s. [SUBMEDIAL.]

Music: The sixth note of the diatonic scale, or middle note between the octave and sub-dominant; thus, in the scale of C, A is the submedian.

süb-mēn'-tal, a. [Lat. sub=under, and mentum=the chin.]

Anat.: Situated or being under the chin; as, a submental artery or vein.

süb-mērgē', v. t. & i. [Fr. submerger, from Lat. submergo, from sub=under, and mergo=to plunge; Sp. sumergir; Port. submergir; Ital. sommergere.]

A. Transitive:

1. To plunge or put under water.

2. To cover with water; to overflow with water; to inundate, to drown.

"So half my Egypt was submerg'd, and made A cistern for scald snakes."
Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 5.

B. Intrans.: To plunge under water; to be buried or covered, as by a fluid; to sink out of sight.

süb-mērgēd', pa. par. or a. [SUBMERGE.]

submerged-pump, s. A well or cistern pump which is placed under water, the pump-rod and discharging pipe reaching from the surface of the ground to the pump.

süb-mērg'-ence, s. [Lat. submergens, pr. par. of submergo=to submerge (q. v.).] The act of submerging or plunging under water; submersion.

"The same marine shells demonstrate the submergence of large areas in Scandinavia and the British Isles during part of the glacial period."—Lyell: Elements of Geol. (ed. 4th), p. 140.

süb-mērse', v. t. [Lat. submersus, pa. par. of submergo=to submerge (q. v.).] To submerge; to plunge under water; to drown.

hōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; tlen, -gion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = beş, döl.

süb-mërse', süb-mërsed', a. [SUBMERSE, v.]

Bot.: Buried under water.

süb-mër'-sion, s. [Fr., from Lat. submersionem, accus. of submersio, from submersus, pa. par. of submergo=to submerge (q. v.).]

1. The act of submerging or putting under water or other fluid; the act of drowning or overflowing.
2. The state of being submerged or put under water or other fluid, or of being overflowed, inundated, or drowned.

"When all had long supposed him dead,
By cold submersion, razor, rope, or lead."

Cowper: Retirement, 584.

süb-mîn'-is-tër, v. t. & i. [Lat. subministro, from sub=under, and ministro=to attend, to serve.]

A. Trans.: To supply, to afford, to yield, to minister.

"The inferior animals have subministered unto man the invention or discovery of many things both natural and artificial and medicinal."—Hale: Orig. of Mankind, p. 154.

B. Intrans.: To serve, to subserve; to be useful.

"Passions, as fire and water, are good servants, but bad masters, and subminister to the best and worst purposes."—L'Estrange.

süb-mîn'-is-trant, adj. [SUBMINISTER.] Subservient, subordinate.

"The attending of that which is subservient and subministrant."—Bacon: Church of England.

süb-mîn'-is-träte, v. t. [Lat. subministratus, pa. par. of subministro=to subminister (q. v.).] To supply, to afford.

"Nothing subministrates apter matter to be converted into pestilent seminaries than steams of nasty folks."—Harvey: On Consumption.

süb-mîn'-is-trä'-tion, subst. [SUBMINISTRATE.] The act of furnishing or supplying; supplying.

"Which [treaty] the electors of Mentz and Colen have broken by permission of Spinola; nay, divers ways, by subministration of commodities to his army."—Reliquiae Wottonianae, p. 529.

süb-miss', a. [Lat. missus, pa. par. of submitto=to submit (q. v.).]

1. Submissive, humble, obsequious.

"In adoration at His feet I fell Submiss." Milton: P. L., viii. 316.

2. Low, soft, gentle.

"As age enfeebleth a man, the grindings are weaker, and the voices of them more submiss."—Smith: Portrait of Old Age, p. 118.

süb-mis'-sion (ss as sh), s. [O. Fr. soumission, from Lat. submissionem, accus. of submissio, from submissus=submit (q. v.); Fr. soumission; Spanish sumision.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of submitting or yielding to power; surrender of the person and power to the control and government of another.

"Proclaim a pardon to the soldiers fled,
That in submission will return to us."

Shakesp.: Richard III., v. 4.

2. The state of being submissive; acknowledgment of inferiority or dependence; humble and suppliant behavior; weakness.

"He exacted from the republic of Genoa the most humiliating submissions."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

*3. Acknowledgment of a fault; confession of error.

"Be not as extreme in submission
As in offense."

Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iv. 4.

4. Compliance with the commands, laws, or wishes of a superior; obedience; as, the submission of children to their parents.

II. Law: An agreement by which parties agree to submit a disputed point to arbitration.

süb-mis'-sive, adj. [Latin submissus=submit (q. v.).]

1. Ready, disposed, or willing to submit; yielding to power or authority; obedient.

"Whose submissive spirit was to me Rule and restraint."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. ii.

2. Testifying, showing, or expressing submission; pertaining to or characteristic of submission.

"It had no bad effect on their behavior, which was remarkably civil and submissive."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. v., ch. v.

süb-mis'-sive-lý, adv. [Eng. submissive; -ly.] In a submissive manner; with submission; with confession or acknowledgment of inferiority; humbly.

3. The act of calming down; the state of becoming calm or quiet.

"By the subdual or subsidence of the more violent passions."—Warburton: Sermons, vol. x, ser. 32.

II. Geol.: The sinking of the land, or of a sea, lake, or river-bed, the result in very many cases of earthquake action. In the Lisbon earthquake of Nov. 1, 1755, a new quay disappeared, with all the people who had taken refuge upon it, the depth of water where it sunk being a hundred feet. On June 16, 1819, a violent earthquake occurred at Cutch, in the delta of the Indus, and, among other effects of the convulsion, the estuary at the fort of Luckput, previously a foot deep at low water, was increased to eighteen feet, the adjacent village of Sindree being submerged to the housetops. Other earthquakes have produced similar effects. Subsidence is in progress at present over wide areas in the Pacific. [ATOLL.] It may take place in elevated inland regions, and the inhabitants not be aware that a change of level has occurred. Lyell (Prin. Geol., ch. xi., xxxiii.) suggested that subsidence might arise from the melting of porous rocks, which, when fluid and subjected to great pressure, occupied less room than before; or which, by passing from a pasty to a crystalline condition, might suffer contraction; or from the subtraction of lava driven to some volcanic orifice and there forced outwards; or from the shrinking of solid and stony masses during refrigeration. Prof. Seeley considers that depression is inseparable from elevation just as every synclinal fold is a portion of an anticlinal. Hence, beyond the geographical limit of upheaval, a coast is found to be subsiding, and the regions where this condition is seen are necessarily adjacent to those which are being raised.

süb-sid'-i-ar-i-ly, adv. [Eng. subsidiary; -ly.] In a subsidiary manner or degree.

süb-sid'-i-ar-ý, a. & s. [Latin subsidiarius = belonging to a reserve; subsidium = a reserve, aid; Fr. subsidaire.] [SUBSIDY.]

6. Body, strength.

7. Goods; material means and resources; riches, wealth, resources, property.

"Thy substance Cannot amount unto a hundred marks."

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, i. 1.

II. Technically:

*1. Bot.: Texture. (Lindley.)

The first idea of substance is probably derived from the consciousness of self—the conviction gained by experience that, while sensations, thoughts, and purposes are continually changing, the Ego constantly remains the same. Observation teaches us that bodies external to us remain the same as to quantity or extension, though their color and figure, their state of motion or of rest may be changed. But as every power and property of a thing, every mode in which it affects a sentient being, is an accident, and all these accidents may be either actually or mentally abstracted, the question arises, What is left after all the accidents are thus abstracted?—What is the substance? To meet the difficulty, it was assumed that everything possesses, besides its accidents, an unknown substratum on which these accidents rest, or in which they inhere. Locke, without departing from the knowable, placed the substance of an object in some essential or fundamental quality, the presence of which maintained, while its removal destroyed, the identity of the object [ESSENCE, s., II. 1.]; and Fichte made it consist in a synthesis of attributes; holding that these, synthetically united, gave substance, while substance analyzed gave attributes.

"When we speak of substance, we mean only what persists or abides in time, and we contrast the permanent with the changes of its phases. But the substance is not a separate thing over and above its modes or manifestations. It is simply that change or alteration cannot be understood except in reference to something permanent. It is easy, then, to say that substance is a fiction of thought. Kant's reply to that charge is, that to treat successive sensations as having one source common to them (what we must constantly do in our experience), implies, as a ground of its possibility, an identity or persistency in the consciousness which serves as the common vehicle of the successive feelings. Unless thought supplied this persistent, permanent background, it would be impossible for us to realize the relations in time known as succession and simultaneity."—Wallace: Kant, p. 175.

3. Theol.: Essence, nature, being. Used specially of the Three Persons in the Godhead, who are said to be the same in substance, i. e., to possess one common essence.

¶ Principle of substance:

Philos.: The law of the human mind by which every quality or mode of being is referred to a substance.

süb-stī-tū-tion, sub-sti-tu-ci-on, subst. [Fr., from Lat. substitutionem, accus. of substitutio, from substitutus=substitute (q. v.); Sp. substitucion; Ital. sustituzione, sostituzione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of substituting or putting one person or thing in the place of another to serve the same purpose.

"The Rabbin of the Jews who lived since the dispersion of the nation, thought all would be well if for tutelar deities they substituted tutelar angels. From this substitution the system which I have described arose."—Bp. Horsley: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 29.

2. The state of being substituted or put in the place of another to serve the same purpose.

*3. The office of a substitute; delegated authority.

"He did believe
He was the Duke from substitution,
And executing th' outward face of royalty."
Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Alg.: The operation of putting one quantity in place of another, to which it is equal, but differently expressed.

2. Chem.: A term denoting the replacing of one element or group of elements for another. It is the great agent, and covers nearly the whole field of chemical change, and is always attended with some alteration of properties in the compound, the alteration increasing with the amount of the substitution. (1) When chlorine replaces hydrogen in marsh gas, forming hydrochloric acid and methylic chloride, $\text{CH}_4 + \text{Cl}_2 = \text{HCl} + \text{CH}_3\text{Cl}$. (2) When an alcohol radical replaces chlorine, as in trichloride of phosphorus, $3\text{Zn}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_2 + 2\text{PCl}_3 = 3\text{ZnCl}_2 + 2\text{P}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_3$. (3) A basylous or chlorous radical is replaced one for the other, as when nitrate of silver is decomposed by chloride of sodium, $\text{AgNO}_3 + \text{NaCl} = \text{NaNO}_3 + \text{AgCl}$. (4) When hydrogen is replaced by an alcohol radical, as in the case of acting on ammonia with iodide of ethyl, $\text{H}_3\text{N} + \text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{I} = \text{HI} + \text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{N}$. (See SALTS, EQUIVALENTS.)

3. Gram.: Syllepsis (q. v.).

4. Civil Law: A conditional appointment of an heir.

5. Theol.: The doctrine that in the Crucifixion Christ was divinely substituted for, or took the place of, the elect [CALVINISM], or of all mankind [ARMINIANISM], obeying the law in their stead, suffering the penalty, expiating their sins, and procuring for them salvation. [ATONEMENT.] Used also of the principle involved in the bloody sacrifices of the Jewish economy (in which the animals were types of Christ), and in a still wider sense of the offering of the lower animals in the place of men, and of unbloody in the place of bloody sacrifices in ethnic religions. [SACRIFICE, s., II. 1. (4).]

süb-stī-tū-tion-āl, a. [Eng. substitution; -al.] Pertaining to or implying substitution; supplying the place of another.

süb-stī-tū-tion-āl-lŷ, adv. [English substitutional; -ly.] In a substitutional manner; by way of substitution.

süb-stī-tū-tion-ar-ŷ, adj. [Eng. substitution; -ary.] Pertaining to or making substitution; substitutional.

süb'-stī-tū-tive, adj. [Eng. substitut(e); -ive.] Making substitution; tending to afford or provide substitution; capable of being substituted.

"These substitutive particles, which serve to supply the room of some sentence or complex part of it, are styled interjections."—Wilkins: Real Character, pt. iii., ch. ii.

süb'-stī-tū-tōr-ŷ, a. [Eng. substitut(e); -ory.] Substitutional; capable of being substituted for another.

"A few remarks on the proposed cultivation of tobacco as one of the substitutory crops for wheat, &c."—London Echo.

süb-strāct', v. t. [Formed from sub=under, and traho=to draw, on an erroneous supposed analogy with abstract (q. v.).]

1. To subtract.

"Whatsoever time and attendance we bestow upon one thing, we must necessarily subtract from another."—Scott: Christian Life, pt. i., ch. iv.

2. To withdraw.

"Subtracting his gracious direction and assistance, he giveth them over to their own hearts' lusts."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 16.

süb-strāc'-tion, subst. [SUBTRACT.] Subtraction. (Now only in vulgar use.)

"I cannot call this piece Tully's nor my own, being much altered not only by the change of the style, but by addition and subtraction."—Denham.

süb-strāc'-tōr, s. [Eng. subtract; -or.] One who subtracts; a subtracter; hence, a detractor, a slanderer.

"They are scoundrels and substractors that say so of him."—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, i. 3.

süb'-sträte, s. [SUBSTRATE, v.] A substratum (q. v.).

süb-sträte, v. t. [Lat. substratus, pa. par. of substerno: sub=under, and sterno=to strew.] To strew or lay under something.

"The melted glass being supported by the substrated sand."—Boyle: Works, ii. 222.

süb-strā'-tūm (pl. süb-strā'-tā), subst. [Lat. neut. singular of substratus, pa. par. of substerno.] [SUBSTRATE, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: That which is laid or spread under; that which underlies something; specif., a stratum of earth lying under another; subsoil.

†2. Figur.: That which underlies anything; as, there is a substratum of truth in the statement.

II. Philos.: The same as SUBSTANCE, II. 2.

"That which manifests its qualities—in other words, that in which the appearing causes inhere, that to which they belong—is called their subject, or substance, or substratum."—Hamilton: Metaphysics (ed. Mansel), i. 137.

süb-strüct', v. t. [SUBSTRUCTION.] To build beneath; to lay as the foundation of.

süb-strüc'-tion, s. [Lat. substructio, from substructus, pa. par. of substruo=to build under; sub=under, and struo=to build.] An underbuilding; a mass of building under another; a foundation.

"To found our habitation firmly, examine the bed of earth upon which we build, and then the underfillings, or substruction, as the ancients called it."—Wotton: Remains, p. 17.

süb-strüct'-ture, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. structure (q. v.).] An understructure; a foundation.

"Being adapted in modern times to various uses, for example, as the substructure of a wind-mill."—Longfellow: Skeleton in Armor. (Introd.)

süb-stÿ'-lar, süb-stī'-lar, a. [Eng. substyl(e); -ar.] Of or pertaining to the substyle; consisting of the substyle.

Dialing: A right line on which the gnomon or style is erected at right angles with the plane.

"Erect the style perpendicularly over the substilar line, so as to make an angle with the dial-plane equal to the elevation of the pole of your place."—Moxon: Mech. Exercises.

süb-stÿle, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. style (q. v.).]

Dialing: The line on which the style or gnomon stands, formed by the intersection of the plane of the dial with the plane which passes through the gnomon.

süb-sül'-tīve, adj. [Lat. subsultum, sup. of subsilio=to leap up; sub=under, and salio=to leap.] Moving by sudden leaps or starts; bounding; having a spasmodic character.

"The earth, I was told, moved up and down like the boiling of a pot: . . . this sort of subsultive motion is ever accounted the most dangerous."—Bishop Berkeley: Letters, p. 147.

süb-sült'-ör-i-lÿ, adv. [Eng. subsultory; -ly.] In a subsultory or bounding manner; by leaps; by fits and starts.

"The spirits spread even, and move not subsultorily; for that will make the parts close and pliant."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 326.

süb-sült'-ör-ÿ, a. [SUBSULTIVE.] Subsultive, spasmodic.

"Flippancy opposed to solemnity, the subsultory to the continuous, these are the two frequent extremities to which the French manner betrays men."—De Quincey: Works, x. 197.

süb-sül'-tūs, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. subsultus, pa. par. of subsilio.] [SUBSULTIVE.]

Pathol.: Leaping, twitching. Used chiefly of a spasmodic or clonic convulsion, perceptible mainly in the tendons of the wrist. In a more general sense it is applied to all involuntary twitching or spasmodic contraction of muscular parts. Subsultus is often a prelude to general convulsions; it frequently arises during the course of continued fevers, and is generally an unfavorable symptom.

süb-sūme', v. t. [Lat. sub=under, and sumo=to take.] To include under a more general class or category; to place under, and as being comprehended in a wider notion.

"St. Paul cannot name that word, 'sinners,' but must straight subsume in a parenthesis, 'of whom I am a chief.'"—Hammond: Works, iv. 614.

süb-sūmp'-tion (p silent), s. [Lat. sub=under, and sumptio=a taking.]

1. The act of subsuming; the act of including under something more general, as a particular under a universal, a species under a genus, &c.

2. That which is subsumed; the minor clause or premise of a syllogism.

süb-sūmp'-tive (p silent), a. [SUBSUMPTION.] Of or relating to a subsumption; of the nature of a subsumption.

süb-täck, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. tack (q. v.).] An under-lease; a lease of a farm tenement, &c., granted by the principal tenant or leaseholder. (Scotch.)

süb-tän'-ğent, s. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. tangent (q. v.).]

Conic Sections: That part of an axis included between the points in which a tangent cuts it and the foot of the ordinate through the point of contact. The subtangent and subnormal are projections of the tangent and normal upon the axis on which they are taken, or to which they are referred. The subtangent and the subnormal form the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle, whose other sides are the tangent and the normal; hence the square of the ordinate of the point of contact is always equal to the product of the subtangent and subnormal.

süb-tar-tär'-ě-an, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. Tartarean (q. v.).] Situated, being, or living under Tartarus; infernal.

"From the infernal bowers Invokes the sable subtartarean powers."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xiv. 314.

süb-tēc'-tā-cle, s. [Lat. subtectus, pa. par. of subtego=to cover below.] A tabernacle, a covering.

"This is true Faith's intire subtectacle."

Davies: Holy Roode, p. 20.

süb-tēg-ū-lā'-ně-ōūs, a. [Lat. subtegulaneus, from sub=under, and tegula=tiles, roof.] Under the eaves or roof; within doors.

süb-tēn'-ant, s. [Pref. sub-, and English tenant (q. v.).] An under-tenant; a tenant under a tenant; one who rents a house, land, &c., from a tenant.

süb-tēnd', v. t. [Lat. subtendo, from sub=under, and tendo=to stretch.]

Geom.: To extend under or be opposite to.

"If two angles of a triangle be equal to one another, the sides which subtend, or are opposite to the equal angles, are equal to one another."—Euclid, I. 6.

süb-tēnsē', s. [Lat. subtensus, pa. par. of subtendo=to subtend (q. v.).]

Geom.: A line subtending or stretching across; a chord of an arc; a line or angle opposite to a line or angle spoken of.

"An equal subtense (you say) subtends an equal periphery, a greater a greater, and a lesser a less."—Barrow: Mathematical Lectures, lect. 22.

süb-tēp'-id, adj. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. tepid (q. v.).] Moderately warm; slightly tepid.

süb-tēr, pref. [Lat.] A Latin preposition meaning under, and used in composition with much the same force as sub.

süb-tēr'-flū-ent, süb-tēr'-flū-ōūs, a. [Latin subterfluens, pr. par. of subterfluo=to flow under; subter=under, and fluo=to flow.] Flowing or running under or beneath.

süb-tēr-fūge, s. [Fr., from Low Latin subterfugium, from Lat. subterfugio=to escape secretly; subter=under, secretly, and fugio=to fly.] That to which a person resorts for escape or concealment; a shift, an evasion; an artifice employed to escape censure, or the force of an argument, or to justify opinions or conduct.

"This plea the king considered as the subterfuge of a vanquished disputant."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

2. Bot.: Growing under the earth.

subterraneous-forest, s.

Geol.: A forest beneath the surface of the ground. It may be recent or may belong to a more or less remote geological period. [DIRT-BED, SUBMARINE-FOREST.]

süb-tēr-rā'-ně-ōūs-lÿ, adv. [Eng. subterraneous; -ly.] In a subterraneous manner; hence, secretly, imperceptibly.

süb-tēr-rān'-i-tÿ, subst. [SUBTERRANEAN.] A place under ground.

"We commonly consider subterraneities, not in contemplations sufficiently respective unto the creation."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii., ch. i.

süb-tēr-ra-nÿ, a. & s. [SUBTERRANEAN.]

A. As adj.: Subterranean, underground.

"They [metals] are wholly subterranean; whereas plants are part above earth, and part under earth."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 603.

B. As subst.: That which lies or is underground.

"We see that in subterraneities there are, as the fathers of their tribes, brimstone and mercury."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 354.

süb-tēr-rēne', a. [Lat. subterrenus, from sub=under, and terra=the earth.] Subterranean.

"The earth is full of subterrene fires."—Sandys: Travels, p. 202.

süb-tēr-rēs'-tri-ā, adj. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. terrestrial (q. v.).] Below the earth.

"This subterrestrial country."—T. Browne: Works, ii. 209.

süb-tīle (or as süt'l), süb-tīl, sot-el, sot-il, sot-ile, süb-tīll, a. [O. Fr. sotil, sotyl, subtil, from Lat. subtilis=fine, thin, slender, precise, accurate, subtle, from sub=under, and tela (for texla)=a web; texo=to weave; O. Sp. & Port. subtil; Sp. sutil; Ital. sottile.]

1. Tenuous, thin; not dense or gross; extremely fine.

"Aloft the subtile sunbeams shine."

süb-tõn'-ic, subst. [Pref. sub-, and English tonic (q. v.).]

1. Mus.: The same as SUBSEMITONE (q. v.).

2. Proc.: An elementary sound or element of speech having a partial vocality; a vocal or sonant consonant.

süb-tõr'-rid, a. [Prof. sub-, and English torrid (q. v.).] Approximately torrid. Applied to a region or climate bordering on the torrid zone.

süb-träct', v. t. [Latin subtractus, pa. par. of subtraho=to draw away, to subtract; sub=under, and traho=to draw.] To withdraw or take away a part from the rest; to deduct; as, to subtract three from six.

süb-träct'-ēr, s. [Eng. subtract; -er.]

1. One who subtracts or deducts.

*2. The number or quantity to be taken from a larger number or quantity; the subtrahend.

süb-träc'-tion, s. [Latin subtractio, from subtractus, pa. par. of subtraho=to subtract (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of subtracting or deducting a part from a whole; deduction.

2. In the same sense as II. 1.

II. Technically:

1. Arith.: The act or operation of taking a lesser number from a greater of the same kind or denomination; the operation of finding the difference between two numbers, or the operation of finding a number which, being added to the lesser of two numbers, will produce the greater. The greater number is called the minuend, the lesser the subtrahend, and the difference the remainder.

Minuend	...	943,652
Subtrahend	...	256,349

Remainder	...	687,303
-----------	-----	---------

2. Algebra: As algebra deals with negative as well as positive quantities, the minuend (as in the example) is often less than the subtrahend. The algebraical difference of two quantities is obtained by changing the sign of the subtrahend and adding it to the minuend.

Minuend	...	3x-2y-4z
Subtrahend	...	2x+4y+5z

Remainder	...	x-6y-9z
-----------	-----	---------

3. Law: A withdrawing or neglecting, as when a person who owes any suit, duty, custom, or service to another, withdraws it, or neglects to perform it.

"The suit for restitution of conjugal rights is brought whenever the husband or wife is guilty of the injury of subtraction, or lives separate from the other without any sufficient reason."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 8.

süb-träc'-tive, a. [Eng. subtract; -ive.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: Tending or having power to subtract.

2. Math.: Having the minus sign (—) placed before it.

süb'-tra-hěnd, subst. [Lat. subtrahendum, neut. sing. of subtrahendus, fut. pass. pa. of subtraho=to subtract (q. v.).]

Math.: The sum, number, or quantity to be subtracted or taken from another. [SUBTRACTION, II. 1.]

süb-träns-lü'-çent, a. [Pref. sub-, and English translucent (q. v.).] Partially or imperfectly translucent.

süb-träns-pär'-ent, a. [Pref. sub-, and English transparent (q. v.).] Partially or imperfectly transparent.

süb-tri-äh'-gu-lar, a. [Pref. sub-, and English triangular (q. v.).] Nearly but not quite triangular.

süb-tri'-fīd, adj. [Pref. sub-, and English trifid (q. v.).] Slightly trifid.

süb-tri-hě'-drāl, a. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. trihedral (q. v.).] Shaped somewhat like a three-sided pyramid.

II. Music:

1. The order in which the notes of a melody proceed. There are two sorts of succession, regular, or conjoint, and disjunct. A regular or conjoint succession is that in which the notes succeed each other in the order of the scale to which they belong, either ascending or descending. In a disjunct succession the melody is formed of intervals greater than a second.

2. A sequence is sometimes spoken of as a succession, and passages of similar chords or progressions are described as a succession of thirds, fourths, fifths, sixths, sevenths, or octaves, as the case may be.

¶ (1) Acts of succession:

Eng. Hist.: The name given to several acts of Parliament, by which the succession to the crown was limited or modified. The first is the Act 7 Henry IV., c. 2, declaring Prince Henry heir-apparent to the thrones of England and France, with remainders to the other children of Henry IV. Other instances occurred in the case of Henry VII., and in regard to the successors of Henry VIII., and the rights of James I., Charles I., and Charles II. The most important is the Act of Settlement. [SETTLEMENT, ¶.]

(2) Apostolic, or Apostolical succession: [APOSTOLIC, ¶.]

(3) Arms of succession: [FEUDAL, ¶.]

(4) Geological succession of organic beings: The gradual disappearance of species, genera, families, &c., throughout the world as geological time goes forward, or the more rapid succession of one group of organisms to another within a limited area, as the adaptation of that area to particular forms of life changes, by water giving place to land, salt to fresh water, or the reverse. Within limited areas, however, the same type often persists from the later Tertiary to the present day; as in South America, where the Sloth and Armadillo have succeeded gigantic Edentates like Megatherium and Glyptodon.

(5) Law of succession: The law or rule according to which the succession to the property of deceased persons is regulated. In general this law obtains only in cases in which the deceased person has died intestate, or in which the power of bequeathing property by will is limited by the legislature. In England primogeniture is the general rule in cases of real estate, the eldest son and his issue taking the whole of the freehold estate; and, failing such stock, the next eldest son, and so on. This rule is, however, subject to dower—generally one-third to the widow of the intestate. When males fail the daughters succeed, but they take, not in order of seniority, but altogether. When there is no lineal descendant, the nearest lineal ancestor succeeds. In regard to movable property no right of primogeniture nor preference of males over females is recognized, the property being divided in equal proportions among the children or, failing them, the nearest kinsmen of the deceased, without respect to sex or seniority. In the United States each state has its own law of succession. Usually succession is by stirpes or root (q. v.).

(6) Succession of crops: [ROTATION, ¶.]

(7) Wars of succession:

Hist.: The name given to several wars in Europe between the middle of the seventeenth century and the middle of the eighteenth, on the occasion of the failure of an heir to a throne. The most important were that concerning the Orleans succession to the Palatinate (1686-97), closed by the Peace of Ryswick; the Spanish succession (1702-1713), the Polish succession (1733-38), closed by the Peace of Vienna; the Austrian succession (1740-48), and the Bavarian succession (1777-79). The second was the most important to English interests, and arose from the rival claims of Philip, Duke of Anjou, grandson of Louis XIV, and of Charles, second son of Leopold, Emperor of Germany, to the throne of Spain. The Grand Alliance between England, Holland, and Austria was revived by William III., and the war which followed, though Philip's claim was ultimately admitted, is famous for the victories of the Allies, under Marlborough, at Blenheim (1704), Oudenarde (1708), Malplaquet (1709), and the capture of Gibraltar (July 24, 1704) by the English and Dutch fleets, under Sir George Rooke. The war was practically concluded by the Peace of Utrecht, April 11, 1713, between France and the English and Dutch. The emperor abandoned the struggle in the following year.

Mineralogy:

1. The same as AMBER (q. v.).

2. A name given to a yellow variety of garnet found in globular aggregations inclosed in asbestos, in Switzerland.

süc'-çin-äm'-íc, a. [Eng. succin(ic), and amic.] Derived from or containing succinic acid and ammonia.

succinamic-acid, s.

Chemistry: $C_2H_4 \begin{smallmatrix} < \\ CO(H_2N) \\ COHO \end{smallmatrix}$. Its barium salt is obtained by leaving a solution of succinimide and barium hydrate in equivalent proportions to evaporate over oil of vitriol and recrystallizing several times from weak alcohol. By decomposing with sulphuric acid, impure crystals of succinamic acid are obtained, which soon decompose into succinate of ammonia.

süc'-çin'-a-míde, subst. [English succin(ic), and amide.]

Chem.: $C_2H_4 \begin{smallmatrix} < \\ CO(H_2N) \\ CO(H_2N) \end{smallmatrix}$. Obtained by mixing ethylic succinate with strong aqueous ammonia. It forms small white crystals, soluble in boiling water, nearly insoluble in cold water, alcohol, and ether.

süc'-çin'-a-níl, subst. [English succin(ic), and anil(ine).]

Chem.: $C_4H_4O_2(C_6H_5)_2N$. Obtained by heating pulverized succinic acid with dry aniline, and then dissolving it out with boiling water. It crystallizes from alcohol in fine interlaced needles sublimable without decomposition. It is insoluble in cold water.

süc'-çin'-a-níl'-íc, adj. [Eng. succinanil; -ic.] Derived from or containing succinanil.

succinanilic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_2H_4 \begin{smallmatrix} < \\ CO(C_6H_5HN) \\ COHO \end{smallmatrix}$. Prepared by dissolving succinanil in dilute ammonia and alcohol, boiling for a time, and neutralizing with nitric acid. It forms elongated laminae, very slightly soluble in cold water, more soluble in hot water; melts when heated to 100°, and at a higher temperature decomposes into phenyl succinimide.

süc'-çin'-äs'-phált, subst. [Eng. succin(um), and asphalt.]

Chem.: A resinous substance resembling amber obtained from the granular clay iron ore of Bergen.

süc'-çin'-áte, s. [Eng. succin(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of succinic acid.

succinate of ammonium, s.

Chem.: $C_2H_4 \begin{smallmatrix} < \\ CO(H_4N)O \\ CO(H_4N)O \end{smallmatrix}$. Obtained by saturating succinic acid with ammonia, and leaving it to evaporate over quicklime. It crystallizes in hexagonal prisms; specific gravity, 1.367; very soluble in water and alcohol.

süc'-çin'-át-éd, a. [Eng. succinat(e); -ed.] Combined with or containing succinic acid.

süc'-çinct', a. [Lat. succinctus=prepared, short, small, contracted, pa. par. of succingo=to gird below, to gird or tuck up: sub=under, and cingo=to gird.]

*1. Lit.: Tucked up, girded up so as to leave the legs free.

"His habit fit for speed succinct."

Milton: P. L., iii. 643.

2. Fig.: Compressed into few words; characterized by verbal brevity; brief, short, concise.

"A tale should be judicious, clear, succinct,
The language plain, and incidents well link'd."

Cowper: Conversation, 235.

†süc'-cīnc'-tī, s. pl. [Masc. pl. of Lat. succinctus.] [SUCCINCT.]

Entom.: Girted; a term applied to the chrysalids of the Papilionidæ, which are not only attached by the tail, but also supported by a belt of silk passing round the middle of the body and fixed firmly on each side. (Newman.)

süc'-çinct'-lý, adv. [Eng. succinct; -ly.] In a succinct manner; briefly, concisely, shortly.

"He [John Pell] hath also succinctly and clearly demonstrated the second and tenth books of Euclid."—Wood: Fasti Oxon., vol. ii.

süc'-çinct'-nëss, s. [Eng. succinct; -ness.] The quality or state of being succinct; brevity, conciseness.

"In fine, brevity and succinctness of speech is that which, in philosophy or speculation, we call maxim, and first principle."—South: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 4.

süc'-çin'-ë-ä, s. [Lat. succineus=of or pertaining to amber.]

Zoölogy & Palæont.: Amber-snail, a genus of Helicidæ (q. v.), with 155 recent species, universally distributed. Shell imperforate, thin, ovate or oblong; spine small, aperture large; columella and peristome simple, acute; animal large, with short thick tentacles and broad foot; lingual teeth like Helix (q. v.). These snails inhabit damp places, but rarely enter the water.

süc'-çin'-ëll'-íte, s. [Lat. succinum=amber.]

Min.: A name given by Dana to an orthorhombic mineral substance obtained from amber by distillation. Hardness, 1.0; specific gravity, 1.55; luster, vitreous; colorless or white; odor, aromatic; soluble in water. Composition: Carbon, 40.7; hydrogen, 5.1; oxygen, 54.2=100.

süc'-çin'-eü'-pi-öne, s. [Lat. succin(um)=amber, and Eng. eupione.]

Chem.: A name applied by Elsner to a very light oil, obtained by rectifying oil of amber with sulphuric acid. (Watts.)

süc'-çin'-íc, a. [Eng. succin(um); -ic.] Derived from or contained in amber.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; müte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ē: ey = ä. qu = kw.

succinic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_6O_4 = C_2H_4 \begin{Bmatrix} COHO \\ COHO \end{Bmatrix}$. Volatile salt of amber. A dibasic acid belonging to the oxalic series, first recognized by Agricola in 1657. It occurs ready formed in amber, in certain plants, and in many animal fluids, and is a product of the oxidation of fatty acids of high molecular weight, and of the alcoholic fermentation of sugar. It is prepared by bringing calcium malate in contact with one-twelfth of its weight of decayed cheese, suspended in three parts of water, and kept for some days at a temperature of 30° to 40°. Succinate of lime is formed, which is collected on a filter, decomposed with sulphuric acid, purified by recrystallization. It crystallizes in monoclinic prisms, is readily soluble in water, less easily in alcohol, insoluble in ether, melts at 180°, and boils at 235°. It forms neutral and acid salts, those of the alkalies being very soluble in water. A characteristic reaction of succinic acid and soluble succinates is the formation of a red-brown precipitate with ferric salts.

succinic-anhydride, s.

Chem.: $C_2H_4 \begin{Bmatrix} CO \\ CO \end{Bmatrix} > O$. Obtained by distilling succinic acid once or twice with phosphoric anhydride. It is a white mass, soluble in boiling absolute alcohol, and deposited from the solution in needles on cooling, insoluble in ether. Melts at 119°6'.

succinic-chloride, s.

Chem.: $C_2H_4 < \begin{Bmatrix} COCl \\ COCl \end{Bmatrix}$. Produced by distilling succinic anhydride with phosphoric pentachloride. It is a fuming, strongly refracting liquid, boils at 190°, and with water yields succinic acid.

succinic-ethers, s. pl.

Chem.: Compounds of succinic acid with alcohol radicals. Ethylic succinate = $C_2H_4 < \begin{Bmatrix} CO(C_2H_5)O \\ CO(C_2H_5)O \end{Bmatrix}$. Is prepared by distilling ten parts succinic acid, twenty parts alcohol, and five parts strong hydrochloric acid, and purifying the product by distillation over lead oxide. It is an oil, boiling at 214°; specific gravity, 1.036, slightly soluble in water. Methyl succinate = $C_2H_4 < \begin{Bmatrix} CO(CH_3)O \\ CO(CH_3)O \end{Bmatrix}$ is similarly prepared. It forms a crystalline mass, dissolves in alcohol and ether, boils at 198°, melts at 20°, the liquid having a specific gravity of 1.179.

succin-īm-ide, s. [English. succin(ic); and -imide.]

Chem.: $C_2H_4 < \begin{Bmatrix} CO \\ COHN \end{Bmatrix}$. Formed by the action of dry ammonia gas on succinic anhydride. It is obtained in large transparent crystals, which melt at 125-126°, sublime without alteration, and are easily soluble in water and alcohol.

succin-ite, s. [SUCCIN.]

succin-ōne, s. [Eng. succin(um); -one.]

Chem.: The name applied to the volatile oil obtained by the distillation of neutral succinate of calcium. Its composition is uncertain.

succin-ō-sul-phūr-ic, a. [Eng. succin(ic); o connect., and sulphuric.] [SULPHOSUCCINIC.]

succin-ōus, a. [Lat. succinum=amber.] Pertaining to or resembling amber.

succin-ūm, s. [Lat.] [AMBER.]succin-yl, s. [Eng. succin(um); -yl.]

Chem.: $C_4H_4O_2$. The hypothetical diatomic radical of succinic acid.

suc-ċi-gion, s. [Lat. succisio, from succisus, pa. par. of succido=to cut down; sub=under, and cædo=to cut.] The act of cutting off or down.

"Upon waste brought and assigned in the succision of trees, the justification is, that they were overthrown by wind."—Bacon.

suc-ċis-tēr-ēne, s. [Lat. succi(num)=amber, and Gr. stereos=solid.]

Chem.: The name given to that portion of Colophonium succini which is insoluble in alcohol and ether. (Watts.)

suc-clā-mā-tion, subst. [Lat. sub=under, and clamo=to call out.] Quiet exhortation; suggestion.

"Why may we not also, by some such succlamations as these, call off young men to the better side."—Translation of Plutarch's Morals, pt. iii., p. 412.

succ-cōr, succ-coūr, v. t. [O. Fr. sucurre, soscorre, from Lat. succurro=to run under, to run to the aid of, to succor; sub=under, and carro=to run; Fr. secourir; Sp. socorrer; Port. socorrer; Ital. soccorrere.] To run to the aid of; to aid, to help; to assist in difficulty or distress; to relieve.

"To succour wasted regions, and replace The smile of opulence in sorrow's face."
Couper: Charity, 129.

succ-cōr, succ-coūr, *soc-oure, *soc-ourse, *suc-urs, s. [O. Fr. socors, from Lat. succursus, from succurro=to succor (q. v.).]

1. Aid, help, assistance; particularly assistance that delivers from difficulty, want, or distress.

"The devotion of life or fortune to the succor of the poor is a height of virtue to which humanity has never arisen by its own power."—Tatler, No. 4.

2. The person who or thing which brings aid, help, or assistance.

"Hire to salve, and eke hire for to prey
To ben our help, and socour whan we dey."

Chaucer: C. T., 13, 461.

†3. (Pl.): Troops serving as an aid or relief.

"There rode the Volscean succors."

Macaulay: Battle of Lake Regillus, xiii.

succ-cōr-ā-ble, a. [Eng. succor; -able.]

1. Capable of being succored, aided, or relieved; admitting of succor.

2. Affording succor or relief; helpful, aiding.

"If the physition be not verie answerable in liking to the patient, perceiving him not so succourable as hee desireth or would have such a physition, shall never proceed successfully."—Time's Storehouse, 780-2.

succ-cōr-ēr, s. [Eng. succor, v.; -er.] One who succors; one who affords aid or relief; a helper.

"She hath been a succourer of many."—Romans xvi. 2.

succ-cōr-ēss, s. [Eng. succor; -ess.] A female helper. (Stanyhurst.)

succ-cōr-lēss, succ-coūr-lēss, a. [Eng. succor; -less.] Destitute of succor, aid, or help.

"And all his friends and souldiers, succourlesse Perisht but he."—Chapman: Homer's Odyssey, v.

succ-cōr-ŷ, s. [A corrupt. of chicory (q. v.).]

Bot.: Cichorium intybus. [CHICORY.]

succ-cōse, a. [Lat. succus=juice.] Full of juice.

succ-cō-tāsh, s. [N. Amer. Indian m'sickquatash=corn boiled whole.] Green maize and beans boiled together; originally a North American Indian dish.

succ-cō-trīne, a. [SOCOTRINE.]

succ-cūb, s. [SUCCUBUS.] A succubus (q. v.).

"Our succub Satanick now found,
She touched his soul in place unsound."

D'Urfey: Anthenian Jilt.

succ-cū-bā, s. [SUCCUBUS.]

succ-cū-bine, a. [Eng. succub(us); -ine.] Of or belonging to a succubus (q. v.).

"Oh, happy the slip from his succubine grip."

Barham: Ing. Leg.: St. Nicholas.

succ-cū-boūs, a. [Latin succubo=to lie under.] [SUCCUBUS.]

Bot. (of the Jungermanniaceæ): Having the anterior margin of each leaf placed below the posterior margin of the immediately succeeding one.

succ-cū-būs (pl. succ-cū-bī), succ-cū-bā (pl. succ-cū-bæ), s. [Mod. Lat. from Latin succuba=a trumpet; succubo=to lie under; sub=under, and cubo=to lie.]

1. Anthrop. (of both forms): A demon believed to have the power of assuming the shape of a woman in order to consort sexually with men. [INCUBUS, LAMIA.]

"This is the doctrine of the incubi and the succubi those male and female nocturnal demons which consort sexually with men and women. We may set out with their descriptions among the islanders of the Antilles, where they are the ghosts of the dead, vanishing when clutched; in New Zealand, where ancestral deities 'form attachments with females, and pay them repeated visits;' while in the Samoan Islands, such intercourse of inferior gods caused 'many supernatural conceptions;' and in Lapland, where details of this last extreme class have also been placed on record. From these lower grades of culture we may follow the idea onward. Formal rites are specified in the Hindu Tantra, which enable a man to obtain a companion-nymph by worshipping her and repeating her name by night in a cemetery. Augustine, in an instructive passage, states the popular notions of the visits of incubi . . . yet he is careful not to commit himself to a positive belief in such spirits. Later theologians were less cautious, and grave argumentation on nocturnal intercourse with incubi and succubi was carried on till, at the height of mediæval civilization, we find it accepted in full belief by ecclesiastics and lawyers."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 189, 190.

2. Pathol. (of the form succubus): Nightmare.

succ-cū-lā, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A plain axis or cylinder, provided with staves or handles for turning it, but having no drum.

succ-cū-lençe, succ-cū-len-çŷ, s. [Eng. succulent(t); -ce, -cy.] The quality or state of being succulent or juicy; juiciness.

succ-cū-lent, a. [French, from Lat. succulentus, from succus=juice.] Full of juice; juicy.

"As the leaves are not succulent, little more juice is pressed out of them than they have imbibed."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. i. ch. xviii.

succulent-plants, s. pl.

Bot.: Plants characterized by the succulence of their stems, their leaves, or their whole organization. This is produced by a remarkable distension or increase of the cellular tissue. Their organization enables them to derive their nourishment from the air rather than from the ground, and flourish in dry places. When cultivated, they are planted in sandy loam not too finely sifted, and require very little watering. They do not flourish well with other plants, but should have a greenhouse of their own. The succulent orders of plants, Cactaceæ, Mesembryanthemaceæ, Crassulaceæ, &c., are not closely akin to each other. Succulence may be associated with any structure, and extend through an order, a tribe, a genus, or a species only.

succ-cū-lēn'-tæ, s. pl. [Fem. pl. of Lat. succulentus=succulent.]

Bot.: The forty-sixth order in Linnæus' Natural System. Genera: Cactus, Mesembryanthemum, Sedum, Oxalis, Fagonia, &c.

succ-cū-lent-lŷ, adv. [Eng. succulent; -ly.] In a succulent manner; juicily.

succ-cū-loūs, a. [Lat. succus=juice.] Succulent, juicy.

succ-cūmb' (b silent), *suc-comb, v. i. [Lat. succumbo=to lie or fall under, to yield; sub=under, and cumbo=to lie; Fr. succomber.] To yield; to sink or give way; to submit.

"The smaller and feebler animals have bent and accommodated themselves to changes to which the larger species have succumbed."—Owen: Classif. of Mammalia, p. 56.

succ-cūm'-bent, a. [Lat. succumbens, pr. par. of succumbo=to succumb (q. v.).] Submissive.

"Succumbent and passive to her desires."—Howell: Parly of Beasts, p. 2.

succ-cūr'-sal, a. [Fr. succursale=supplementing a parish church; église succursale=a chapel of ease, from Low Lat. succursus=a succor (q. v.).] Serving as a chapel of ease. (Applied to a church attached as a relief or succor to a parish church.)

succ-cūs (pl. succ-ċi), s. [Lat.=juice.]

Pharm.: The expressed juice of a plant intended to be used medicinally. The strength of the juices varies according to the soil and situation in which the plant grows, the season of the year, &c. Rectified spirit to the extent of one-third the volume of the juice is added to keep the latter from decomposition. Five succi are now official, viz., Succus conii, scoparii, taraxaci, belladonnæ, and hyoscyami. (Garrod.)

succ-cūs-sā-tion, s. [Lat. succussatus, pa. par. of succusso, a freq. from succutio (sup. succussum)=to fling or toss up; sub=under, and quatio=to shake.]

1. A trot; a trotting.

"That is to say, whether trolutation,
As they do term't, or succussation."

Butler: Hudibras, I. ii. 45.

2. A shaking; succussion.

succ-cūs'-siōn (ss as sh), s. [Lat. succussio, from succussum, sup. of succutio=to fling or toss up.] [SUCCUSSATION.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: The act of shaking; a shock.

"The angler, desiring bait, has only to create slight succussion of the soil . . . to lead the earthworm to come to the surface."—Lindsay: Mind in the Lower Animals, i. 53.

2. Med.: A method of exploring the state of the chest, with the view of detecting the effusion of liquid within any of its cavities. Succussion consists in seizing the patient by the shoulder and communicating a smart impulse to the chest, so as to make any liquid which it may contain fluctuate to one side. It was practiced by Hippocrates, and is still, to a certain extent, in use.

†succ-cūs'-sive, a. [Eng. succuss(ion); -ive.]

Geol. (of earthquake action): Characterized by a shaking, and especially by an up and down movement in place of tremulous oscillation. (Dana.)

sūch, *siche, *soche, *suilk, *swich, *swilc, *swilch, *swulc, adj. [A. S. swylc, swilc, swelc, cogn. with O. Sax. sulic; O. Fris. selic, selk, sullik, sulch, suk; Dut. zulk; Icel. slikr; Dan. slig; Sw. slik; O. Sw. salik; Ger. solch; O. H. Ger. solich; Goth. swaleiks. The A. S. swylc, &c., are from swā=so, and lic=like; thus, sūch is a corruption of so-like.]

1. Of that or the like kind or degree; similar, like.

"The judgment of God is according to truth against them which commit sūch things."—Romans ii. 2.

† Sūch is followed by as before that which is the object of comparison.

"Tears sūch as angels weep burst forth."

Milton: P. L., i. 620.

If the indefinite article is used with sūch, it is always placed between it and the noun to which it refers; or sūch follows the noun preceded by a or an; as, sūch an honor, sūch a view, never was there a man sūch as he, &c. If the article is not used, bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aŷ; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan, -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

such precedes the noun, as, such weather. Adjectives may come between such and the noun, as, such fine weather, such a good man. Followed by that, such introduces a consequence or result.

"The birds such pleasure took, that some would sing."
Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, l. 101.

2. The same as mentioned or specified; not another or different; so; in the same state or condition.

"It eats and sleeps, and hath such senses
As we have." Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

3. Belonging to that class.

"No promise can oblige a prince so much Still to be good, as long to have been such."
Dryden. (Todd.)

4. Certain. (Used to indicate or hint in a general and indefinite way at persons or things already named or pointed out, or which could have been named or pointed out distinctly if the speaker pleased.)

"If you repay me not on such a day,
In such a place, such sum or sums as are Express'd in the condition, let the forfeit
Be an equal pound of your flesh."
Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, i. 3.

5. Used without the correlative=so great, so high, very great, very much, very considerable, so good, so bad.

"I could come to such honor."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iii. 1.

¶ *1. Such was in Middle English used with numerals in the sense of as much or as many.

"The length is such ten as the deepness."—Pilgrimage of the Manhode, p. 235.

2. Such is often used adverbially with the sense of so; as, such terrible weather.

*3. For such . . . as the oldest English used swyle. . . . swyle=such . . . such.

4. Such and such, such or such: Certain, some. (Used to denote a person or thing indefinitely or generally.)

"I have appointed my servants to such and such a place."—1 Samuel xxi. 2.

5. Such like:

(1) Of the like kind; of the same sort.

"Such-like toys as these."
Shakesp.: Richard III., i. 1.

(2) Similar persons or things; so forth; et cetera. (Used at the end of enumerations.)

"Virtue, youth, liberality, and such like."
Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, i. 2.

sū-chō-sāu'-rūs, s. [Gr. souchos=an Egyptian name for the crocodile, and sauros=a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Amphibia, with one species from the Wealden of Tilgate Forest.

sūch'-wīse, adv. [Eng. such, and wise.] In such a manner; so.

sūck, souke*, souk-en*, suke* (pa. t. sek*, scē*, sucked, pa. par. isoke*, sucked), v. t. & i. [A. S. sūcan (pa. t. seac, pa. par. socen), sūgan; cogn. with Icel. sūga, suga (pa. t. saug, pa. par. sokinn); Dan. suge; Sw. suga; Ger. saugen; O. H. Ger. sūgan; Wel. sugno=to suck; sug=juice; Ir. sughaim=to suck; sugh=juice; Gael. sug=to suck; sugh=juice; Lat. sugo=to suck; sucus, succus=juice.]

A. Transitive:

1. To draw into the mouth by the action of the lips and tongue, which serves to produce a vacuum.

"The milk thou suckedst from her."
Shakesp.: Titus Andronicus, ii. 3.

2. To draw something from by the action of the lips and tongue.

"I can suck melancholy out of a song, as a weasel sucks eggs."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, ii. 5.

3. To draw in, absorb, or imbibe in any manner more or less resembling the act of sucking. (Often followed by in, out, away, &c.)

"These lubbers, peeping through a broken pane
To suck fresh air, survey'd the neighboring plain."
Dryden: Hind and Panther, iii. 551.

4. To draw, to drain, to extract.

5. To draw, as a whirlpool, to engulf, to swallow up.

"All the under passions,
As waters are by whirlpools suck'd and drawn,
Were quite devour'd in the vast gulph of empire."
Dryden. (Todd.)

B. Intransitive:

1. To draw fluid into the mouth; to draw by exhausting the air, as with a tube.

"Where the bee sucks, there suck I."
Shakesp.: Tempest, v.

2. To draw milk from the breast.

"I would Pluck the young sucking cubs from the she-bear."
Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, ii. 1.

¶ 1. To suck in:

(1) Lit.: To draw into the mouth; to imbibe, to absorb.

(2) Fig.: To cheat, to take in, to deceive. (Slang.)

2. To suck the monkey: [MONKEY, ¶ (3).]

3. To suck up: To draw into the mouth.

sūck, souke*, sucke*, s. [SUCK, v.]

1. The act of sucking, or drawing with the mouth.

2. Milk drawn from the breast by the mouth.

"Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps that never gave suck."—Luke xxiii. 29.

3. A small draught. (Colloq.)

"No house? nor no tobacco—Not a suck, sir."
Massinger: New Way to Pay Old Debts, i. 1.

*4. Juice, succulence.

5. A sweetmeat. [SUCKET.]

suck-in, subst. A take-in, a cheat, a deception. (Slang.) sūck'-a-tāsh, s. [SUCCOTASH.]

sūck'-en-ēr, s. [Eng. sucken; -er.] [SUCKEN.]

sucker (1), s. [SUGAR.] (Scotch.) sūck'-ēr (2), s. [Eng. suck, v.; -er.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) One who or that which sucks or draws with the mouth, especially a young pig.

"For suckers the demand was not very brisk, and prices were stationary."—London Standard.

(2) The piston of a suction-pump.

"Oil must be poured into the cylinder, that the sucker may slip up and down in it more smoothly."—Boyle.

(3) A pipe or tube through which anything is drawn.

"Mariners aye ply the pump
So they, but cheerful, unfatigued, still move
The draining sucker." Philips: Cider, ii.

(4) In the same sense as II. 1.

(5) A round piece of leather having a central perforation for the attachment of a string; when rendered flexible by wetting, and applied to a smooth object, as a stone, the adhesion between the two surfaces due to atmospheric pressure enables the stone to be lifted.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A hard drinker; a soaker.

(2) A sponge, a parasite.

(3) One who extorts money from a candidate.

(4) A cant name for an inhabitant of Illinois.

(5) A sweet, a sweetmeat.

(6) A foolish fellow, a dupe. (Slang.)

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: A branch which proceeds from the neck of a plant, beneath the surface, and, as it emerges from the earth, becomes erect, immediately producing leaves and branches, and subsequently sending down roots from its base. sũf'-fîc'-ient (c as sh), suf-fyc-ient, a. & s. [Lat. sufficiens, pr. par. of sufficio=to suffice (q.v.); Sp. suficiente; Port. & Ital. sufficiente.]

A. As adjective:

1. Equal to any end or purpose proposed; adequate to meet any wants or demands; enough, competent, ample.

"My grace is sufficient for thee."—2 Corinth. xii. 9.

*2. Possessed of adequate talents, accomplishments, or resources; competent, fit, qualified, capable.

"You'll never meet a more sufficient man."

Shakesp.: Othello, iii. 4.

*3. Capable of paying one's debts; solvent, rich.

"My meaning in saying he is a good man, is to have you understand me that he is sufficient."—Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, i. 3.

*4. Self-sufficient, self-satisfied, content.

*B. As subst.: Sufficiency.

"One man's sufficient is more available than ten thousands' multitude."—Sidney: Arcadia, p. 452.

sufficient-reason, determining-reason, s.

Philos.*: A term adopted from the following passage of Leibnitz's Théodicée (i. § 44): "Nothing is done without a sufficient reason; that is, nothing happens without its being possible to one knowing the causes of all things to render a reason which is sufficient why it is so, and not otherwise." He defines the principle of Sufficient Reason, as that in virtue of which we know that no fact can be found real, no proposition true, without a sufficient reason why it is in this way rather than in another. After stating that Archimedes was obliged to take for granted that if there be a balance in which everything is alike on both sides, and if equal weights are hung on the two ends of that balance, the whole will be at rest, because no reason can be given why one side should weigh down rather than the other, Leibnitz goes on to say: "Now by this single principle of the sufficient reason may be demonstrated the being of a God, and all other parts of metaphysics or natural theology, and even, in some measure, those physical truths that are independent of mathematics, such as the dynamical principles or the principles of forces." The Principle of Sufficient Reason as a law of thought is usually stated by logicians thus: Every judgment we accept must rest upon a sufficient reason; and from this the following principles have been derived:

1. Granting the reason, what follows from the reason must also be granted. On this syllogistic inference depends.

2. If all the consequents are held to be true, the reason must be true.

3. If the consequent is rejected, the reason must also be rejected.

4. If the consequent is admitted, we do not of necessity admit the reason, as there may be other reasons or causes of the same effect.

Mansel (Proleg. Log., p. 198) asserts that the Principle of Sufficient Reason is not a law of thought, but only the statement that every act of thought must be governed by some law. [¶]

¶ Axiom of determining (or sufficient) reason:

Logic: A judgment can be derived from another judgment (materially different from it), and finds in it its sufficient reason, only when the (logical) connection of thoughts corresponds to a (real) causal connection. (Ueberweg: Logic (Eng. ed.), § 81.)

sũf'-fîc'-ient-lỹ (c as sh), adv. [Eng. sufficient; -ly.]

1. In or to a sufficient degree; in or to a degree answering the end or purpose proposed; enough, amply.

"The tongue of the new First Lord of the Treasury was not sufficiently ready."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

2. To a considerable degree.

"He himself was sufficiently vain-glorious."—Dryden: Juvenal. (Ded.)

sũf'-fîç'-îng, pr. par. or a. [SUFFICE.]

sũf'-fîç'-îng-lỹ, adv. [Eng. sufficing; -ly.] So as to suffice or satisfy; sufficiently.

sũf'-fîç'-îng-nêss, s. [Eng. sufficing; -ness.] The quality or state of being sufficing; sufficiency.

suf-fisance, suf-fisance, s. [Fr.] Sufficiency, plenty, enough, abundance.

"There him rests in riotous suffisance

Of all gladfulness and kingly joyance."

Spenser: Moitopotmos, 207.

suf-fis-ant, suf-fis-aunt, suf-fis-aunce, adj. [Fr. suffisant, pr. par. of suffire=to suffice (q.v.).] Sufficient. (Gower: C. A., i.)

sŭf'-fō-cāte, v. t. & i. [Fr. suffoquer; Sp. sufocar; Port. suffocar; Ital. suffocare.] [SUFFOCATE, adj.]

A. Transitive:

1. To choke; to kill by stopping the respiration, as by hanging, drowning, or respiring carbonic acid gas; to smother, to stifle.

"Doubtful his death: he suffocated seem'd To most."

Dryden: Ovid; Metamorphoses xii.

2. To stifle; to cause difficulty of respiration to. (Cowper: Task, vi. 670.)

3. To impede respiration in; to compress so as to prevent respiration.

"Let not hemp his windpipe suffocate."

Shakesp.: Henry V., iii. 6.

*4. To stifle, to smother, to extinguish; as, to suffocate live coals or fire.

B. Intransitive:

1. To become suffocated, choked, or stifled.

2. To cause suffocation, to choke; as, The heat is suffocating.

"The suffocating sense of woe."

Byron: Prometheus.

¶ Suffocation is produced by every kind of means, external or internal; to choke is to stifle or suffocate by means of large bodies, as a piece of food, lodging in the throat or larynx.

sŭf'-fō-cāt-īng, pr. par. or a. [SUFFOCATE, v.]

sŭf'-fō-cāt-īng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. suffocating; -ly.] In a suffocating manner or degree; so as to suffocate; as, The room is suffocatingly hot.

sŭf'-fō-cā-tion, s. [Fr. from Lat. suffocationem, accusative of suffocatio, from suffocatus=suffocate (q. v.); Sp. suffocacion; Ital. suffocazione.]

1. The act of suffocating, choking, or smothering.

"Slaine, I call heere, whosoever he be, man, woman, or childe, that violently commeth to his death, whether it be by knife, poyson, cord, drowning, burning, suffocation or otherwise."—Smith: Commonwealth, bk. ii., ch. xxiii.

2. The state of being suffocated, choked, or smothered; death by being suffocated.

"It was a miracle to scape suffocation."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iii. 5.

¶ Suffocation takes place when the air is denied access to the lungs, and may be produced by drowning, by strangulation, by choking, by immobility of the respiratory muscles arising from tetanus, by false membranes obstructing the larynx, &c.

sŭf'-fō-cāt-ive, a. [English suffocat(e); -ive.] Tending or having the power to suffocate; suffocating.

"From rain, after great frosts in the winter, glandulous tumors and suffocative catarrhs proceed."—Arbuthnot: On Air.

"Suffraging their knights and burgesses."—Milton: Reform, in England, bk. ii.

sŭf'-frāg'-in-ōus, a. [Lat. suffrago (genit. suffraginis)=the pastern or hough.] Of or pertaining to the knee-joint of beasts.

"The hough or suffraginous flexure behind rather outward."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iii., ch. i.

suf-fraunce, s. [SUFFERANCE.]

sŭf-frū-tēs'-cent, a. [Pref. suf- for sub-, and Eng. frutescent (q. v.).] Moderately frutescent.

†sŭf-frū-tēx, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. sub, and frutex=a shrub, a bush.]

Bot.: An undershrub (q. v.)

sŭf-frū-ti-cōse, †sŭf-frū-ti-coūs, a. [Pref. suf-, for sub-, and Lat. fruticosus=full of shrubs or bushes.]

Bot. (of a stem): Having the lower and smaller part of the stem woody, while the upper and larger part is herbaceous and dies off every year.

sŭf-fū-mi-gāte, v. t. [Lat. suffumigatus, pa. par. of suffumigo: suf (for sub)=under, and fumigo to fumigate (q. v.).] To apply fumes or smoke to the parts of, as to the body, in medical treatment.

sŭf-fū-mi-gā-tion, s. [SUFFUMIGATE.]

1. The operation of applying fumes to the parts of the body; fumigation.

"If the matter be so gross as it yields not to remedies, it may be attempted by suffumigation."—Wiseman: Surgery.

2. The act of burning perfumes; one of the ceremonies in incantation.

"He did not at the time of his invocation make any suffumigation, at which the spirits were vexed."—Wood: Athenæ Oxon., vol. i.

3. A fume, a fumigation.

"Hippocrates moreover was of this opinion, that a suffumigation made therewith [garlick] fetcheth downe the afterbirth of women newly delivered and brought to bed."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xx., ch. vi.

sŭf-fū-mige, s. [Lat. suffumigo=to suffumigate (q. v.).] A medical fume.

"For external means, drying suffumiges or smoaks are prescribed with good success."—Harvey: On Consumption.

sŭf-fūse, v. t. [Latin suffusus, pa. par. of suffundere=to pour beneath, to suffuse beneath or upon; suf (for sub)=under, and fundo=to pour.] To overspread, as with a fluid or tincture; to fill or cover as with something fluid.

"Medora still (while tears his cheeks suffuse)

The dear remembrance of his lord renews."

Hoole: Orlando Furioso, xviii.

sŭf-fū-ḡion, subst. [Fr., from Lat. suffusionem, accus. of suffusio, from suffusus, pa. par. of suf-fundo=to suffuse (q. v.).]

1. The act or process of suffusing or overspreading, as with a fluid or tincture; the state of being suffused.

"He [Plutarch] being deeply tinctured, as it were, with the suffusions of it, everything which he looked upon, seemed to him colored with it."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 224.

2. That which is suffused or overspread, as a cataract on the eye, or an extravasation of some humor.

"So thick a drop serene hath quenched their orbs, Or dim suffusion veiled." Milton: P. L., iii. 26.

sŭ-fī, s. [SOFI.]

sŭ-fīsm, s. [SOFISM.]

sŭg, subst. [Etyim. doubtful; perhaps allied to suck.] A small kind of worm.

"At which time many of them [trout] have sticking on them sugs, or trout-lice; which is a kind of worm in shape like a clove, or pin with a big head—and sticks close to him, and sucks his moisture; these, I think, the trout breeds himself."—Walton: Angler, bk. i., ch. iv.

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A sweet, crystallized substance manufactured from the expressed juice of various plants, especially from the sugar-cane (q. v.).

(2) Any substance, more or less resembling sugar in any of its properties; as, sugar of lead.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Sweet, honeyed, or soothing words or flattery, used to disguise or hide something distasteful.

(2) Money. (Slang.)

II. Chemical & Sugar Manuf.: $C_n(OH_2)_m$. The generic name for a large number of bodies occurring naturally in the animal or vegetable kingdom, or produced from glucosides by the action of ferments or dilute acids. They are all more or less soluble in water, and their solutions exert a rotatory action on polarized light. Some reduce alkaline solutions of copper, while others either do not, or do so only to a limited extent. They may all be classed under two heads, viz., unfermentable sugars, as mannite, dulcite, sorbite, &c., and fermentable sugars, as cane-sugar, glucose, maltose, &c. Cane-sugar, $C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$, called also Saccharose, Sucrose, and Canose, is found in the juice of many grasses, in the sap of several trees, and in beet and several other roots. It appears to be the transition product between starch and invert-sugar in all plants which yield the latter compounds. Walnuts, almonds, and St. John's bread contain only cane-sugar. It is extracted most easily from sugar-cane, but on the continent of Europe is manufactured on a large scale from beet-root. The expressed juice is heated nearly to the boiling point, and a small quantity of slaked lime added. The clear liquid which separates from the coagulum is evaporated as rapidly as possible, and transferred into shallow vessels to crystallize. Drained from the syrup or molasses, it yields the raw sugar of commerce. When further refined by treatment with animal charcoal, poured into molds, and then dried in a stove, the product is loaf-sugar. When the crystallization is allowed to proceed very slowly, sugar-candy results. Moderately heated it melts, and solidifies on cooling to an amorphous mass, familiar as barley-sugar. Pure sugar separates from its solution in transparent colorless crystals, having the figure of a modified monoclinic prism. It has a pure, sweet taste, and requires for solution only one-third of its weight of cold water. Its crystals have a specific gravity of 1.6. Heated above 210°, water is given off and a brown substance known as caramel remains. Cane-sugar is transformed into invert-sugar by boiling in presence of dilute acids, mineral acting more rapidly than organic acids. Strong sulphuric acid completely decomposes cane-sugar, and nitric acid converts it into saccharic acid. It turns a ray of polarized light to the right, $A_j=73.8$. [INVERT-SUGAR, MAPLE-SUGAR.]

B. As adj.: Made of sugar.

sugar-baker, s. One who refines sugar.

sugar-bean, s.

Bot.: (1) Phaseolus saccharatus; (2) P. lunatus.

sugar-beet, substant. A variety of the Common Beet, Beta vulgaris, cultivated on the Continent of Europe, and to some extent in America, from which is extracted sugar. [BEETROOT-SUGAR.]

sugar-berry, s.

Bot.: Celtis occidentalis; called also the Nettle-tree and the Hackberry.

sugar-birds, s. pl.

Ornith.: The family Cœribidæ, a group of delicate little birds, allied to the Dicæidæ and the Drepanididæ, but with protrusile tongues, and confined almost entirely to the tropical parts of America.

sugar-bush, s. [SUGAR-ORCHARD.]

sugar-camp, s. A place in or near a maple forest where the sap from the trees is collected and manufactured into sugar.

sugar-candy, *sugar-candian, s. Cane-sugar crystallized on threads by slow evaporation.

"Her breath was as sweet as sugar-candian."—J. Taylor: Penniless Pilgrim.

sugar-cane, s.

1. Botany, Hort., &c.: Saccharum officinarum, a strong, cane-stemmed grass, from eight to twelve feet high, producing a large, feathery plume of flowers. It is wild or cultivated in the southern United States, India, China, the South Sea Islands, the West Indies, and South America, flourishing in the zone or belt from the equator to 35° or 40° north and south. The land chosen for its cultivation is usually a good loam or light clay well manured. The leafy ends of the canes of the preceding season are cut off, or the whole cane is cut up, each piece being made to contain two nodes or joints. Twenty thousand of these are planted on each acre in January and February, the harvest begins early in December, and the cutting and crushing of the canes are carried on till January or February. There are several varieties of the sugar-cane.

2. Hist.: It has been supposed that sugar-cane was the "sweet cane from a far country" of Jeremiah (vi. 20; cf. also Isa. xliii. 24). The scripture plant was, however, more probably Andropogon calamus aromaticus. [CANE.] According to Strabo, Nearchus, the admiral of Alexander the Great, describes a kind of honey (probably sugar) from an Indian reed, as did Theophrastus and other writers. Dioscorides uses the term saccharum, derived from the Indian name of the sugar-cane. Europe seems indebted for the plant to the Saracens, who introduced it into Rhodes, Cyprus, Sicily, Crete, and Spain, in the ninth century; the Crusaders, in the twelfth, found it in Syria; the Spaniards and Portuguese carried it to the Canary Islands and Madeira early in the fifteenth. Thence, on the discovery of America, it was transported to the West Indies, where a large sugar industry speedily arose.

sugar-clarifier, s. [CLARIFIER, 2.]

sugar-coated, subst. Coated with a solution of sugar; as pills, &c., to relieve an unpleasant taste.

sugar-evaporator, s. A furnace and pan for condensing saccharine juices or solutions.

sugar-filter, s. The vessel employed for cleansing and decolorizing the defecated syrup by the aid of bone-black.

sugar-fungus, s. [TORULA, YEAST-PLANT.]

sugar-furnace, s. A furnace in which pans are set for boiling sugar-cane juice, the sap of the maple, or other saccharine solutions.

sugar-house, s. A building in which sugar is refined.

sugar-kettle, s. A kettle for boiling the sap of the sugar-maple, the sorghum, or the cane; a sugar-pan.

sugar-loaf, s. & a.A. As substantive:

1. Lit.: A conical mass of refined sugar.

2. Fig.: A high-crowned conical hat, resembling a sugar-loaf in shape.

B. As adj.: Conical and tall, like a sugar-loaf; as, a sugar-loaf hat.

sugar-louse, s. [SUGAR-MITE.]sugar-maple, s.

Bot.: Acer saccharinum, an American tree, sometimes eighty feet high, largely prevailing in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, part of the United States, &c. The leaves are cordate, very smooth, and glaucous beneath. They have five lobes, which are taper, pointed, and toothed, becoming red in the autumn. It is tapped in the spring for its juice, which yields sugar. [ACER.]

sugar-mill, s. A mill for expressing the juice from sugar-canes. It has usually three rollers; two in the same horizontal plane, and the third over and between these. The canes are fed in between the upper and first horizontal rollers, where they receive their first squeeze, the juice running down into a trough at the base of the mill; they then travel onward, receiving a second squeeze between the top roller and the second horizontal roller, which extracts the remaining juice. The residual woody fiber, termed bagasse, when dried, is used as fuel for the furnace-boiler.

sugar-mite, sugar-louse, s.

Entom.: The genus Lepisma, spec. Lepisma saccharina.

sugar-mold, s. A conical iron mold in which sugar is placed to crystallize and allow the molasses to drain away.

sugar-nippers, s. A tool or instrument for cutting loaf-sugar into small pieces.

sugar of acorns, s. [QUERCITE.]

sugar of lead, s. [NEUTRAL PLUMBIC ACETATE; ACETIC-ACID.]

sugar-orchard, sugar-bush, s. A collection or small plantation of maples used for making sugar.

sugar-planter, s. One who owns or manages land devoted to the cultivation of the sugar-cane.

sugar-plum, s. A kind of sweetmeat made of boiled sugar, colored and flavored with various ingredients, and formed into balls or disks.

sugar-refiner, s. One who refines sugar.sugar-refinery, s.

1. A building where sugar is refined.

2. The process of purification of raw or brown sugar. The sugar is (1) dissolved in water a little blood and lime-water being added; (2) filtered in bags to remove feculences; (3) filtered through animal charcoal, to remove color; (4) boiled in a vacuum-pan, to concentrate it; and (5) crystallized in molds.

sugar-sop, s. A sugar-plum.

"Dandle her upon my knee, and give her sugar-sops." Beaum. & Flet.: Monsieur Thomas, ii. 2.

sugar-squirrel, s.

Zoöl.: Petaurus sciureus.

sugar-tongs, s. A small instrument of silver or plated metal, used for lifting small pieces of sugar at table.

sugar-tree, s.

Bot.: (1) Myoporum platycarpum; (2) Acer saccharinum, the sugar-maple (q. v.).

sũg'-ar (s as sh), *sug-er, v. t. & i. [SUGAR, s.]

1. Lit.: To impregnate, flavor, cover, sprinkle, or mix with sugar. [SUGARING, II.]

2. Fig.: To cover or hide, as with sugar; to sweeten, to disguise, as something unpleasant or distasteful, so as to render it acceptable.

"With devotion's visage,
And pious action, we do sugar o'er
The devil himself." Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 1.

¶ To sugar off is to proceed with the last stage in the manufacture of maple sugar—that of granulation.

sũg'-ar-i-nẽss (s as sh), s. [Eng. sugary, -ness.] The quality or state of being sugary or sweet.

sũg'-ar-ing (s as sh), s. [Eng. sugar; -ing.]I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of sweetening, mixing, or covering with sugar.

2. Sugar used for sweetening, &c.

3. The act or process of making sugar.

II. Entom.: A method of catching moths introduced in 1842, and since largely used. A compound of coarse brown sugar dissolved in water and beer, and having a little gum or some essential oil added, is spread on the sheltered side of trunks of trees by a painter's brush. The collector visits the sugared trees after dark with a bull's-eye lantern and catches any moths he may find.

sũg'-ar-lẽss (initial s as sh), a. [Eng. sugar; -less.] Free from sugar.

sũg'-ar-ỹ (s as sh), *sug-rie, adj. [English sugar; -y.]

1. Containing, resembling, or composed of sugar; sweet.

"And with the sugrie sweete thereof allure Chast ladies eares to fantasies impure." Spenser: Mother Hubbard's Tale.

2. Fond of sugar or of sweet things; as, a sugary palate.

su-gẽs'-cent, a. [Lat. sugens, pr. par. of sugo=to suck.] Pertaining or relating to sucking.

"The sugescent parts of animals are fitted for their use, and the knowledge of that use put into them."—Paley: Nat. Theol., ch. xviii.

sũg-gẽst', v. t. & i. [Lat. suggestus, pa. par. of suggero=to carry or lay under, to supply, to suggest; sug (for sub)=under, and gero=to carry.]

A. Transitive:

1. To introduce indirectly into the mind or thoughts; to cause to be thought of by the agency of other objects.

"The growing seeds of wisdom, that suggest . . .
Reflections such as meliorate the heart." Cowper: Task, iii. 302.

sũg-gẽs'-tĩ-õ fãl'-sĩ, phr. [Lat.=the suggestion of something false or untrue.]

1. Logic and Ethics: A term used when one, instead of telling a positive untruth, makes a statement which, though not false, is yet pretty sure to be misunderstood, and is intended to be so.

2. Law: One of the branches of fraud. If suggestio falsi be practiced in drawing out legal conveyances, releases, or agreements, its detection affords a ground for setting them aside.

sũg-gẽs'-tion (tion as chũn), s. [Fr., from Lat. suggestionem, accus. of suggestio, from suggestus, pa. par. of suggero=to suggest (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of suggesting, hinting, or proposing guardedly or with diffidence. (Either in a good or bad sense.)

2. That which is suggested; a hint; a first intimation or proposal.

3. A prompting, especially to evil; a secret incitement; temptation, seduction.

4. Presentation of an idea to the mind; as the suggestions of fancy or imagination.

5. In suggestive therapeutics, any means, such as thought, gesture, signs, words, speech, physical sensations, environment, etc., used to influence the mind of a patient. A simple suggestion is one given under ordinary conditions where there is no degree of hypnosis present. An auto-suggestion is one arising entirely within one's own consciousness from a thought, mental impression or physical sensation. Its basis may be real or imaginary. An oral suggestion is one expressed in speech. A mental suggestion (q. v.), is one conveyed by thought only. A physical suggestion is one which reaches and impresses the mind through any of the five physical senses. A hypnotic suggestion is any form of suggestion conveyed to the patient during the hypnotic sleep. A negative hypnotic suggestion is one that neutralizes the will-power of the patient. A pre-hypnotic suggestion is one given before hypnosis or sleep, and acted upon while entering or during sleep. A post-hypnotic or deferred suggestion is one given during hypnosis, to be acted upon or carried out after hypnosis. This is the form of suggestion most frequently employed in the treatment of disorders.

II. Technically:

1. Law: Information without oath; as—

(1) An information drawn in writing, showing cause to have a prohibition.

(2) A surmise or representation of something, enrolled upon the record of a suit or action, at the instance of a party thereto.

2. Metaph.: The same as ASSOCIATION (q. v.).

¶ (1) Principle of suggestion: Association of ideas.

(2) Relative suggestion: Judgment. Dr. Thomas Brown (1778-1820) Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, divided "the Intellectual States of Mind into Simple and Relative Suggestion; the first corresponding to what others have called Association, and the latter to Judgment. He places under Simple Suggestion: Conception, Memory, Imagination, and Habit; under Relative Suggestion: Coexistence and Succession. (Brown: Philos. Human Mind, lect. xxxiii., xlv.)

sũg-gẽs'-tion-ism (tion as chũn), s. [Eng. suggestion; -ism.] The doctrine that all so-called hypnotic phenomena, faith cures, clairvoyance, Christian Science healings, spirit manifestations, etc., are merely the result of suggestion. [SUGGESTION, 5.]

sū-ī-čīd-āl, a. [Eng. suicid(e); -al.]

1. Partaking of the nature of the crime of suicide; as, suicidal mania.

2. Destructive to one's self, or one's own interests.

"The obstinacy of the English authorities in keeping the army on so reduced a footing is considered simply suicidal."—London Daily Telegraph.

sū-ī-čīd-āl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. suicidal; -ly.] In a suicidal manner.

sū-ī-čīde, s. [Formed in sense 1 from Lat. sui, genit. of se=one's self, and cidum=a slaying, from cædo (in comp. -cido)=to kill; in sense 2, from sui, and -cida=a slayer, on the analogy of homicide, fratricide, &c.; Fr. suicide. Trench says that till the middle of the seventeenth century this word had not established itself in the language; self-homicide was used instead.]

1. Self-murder; the act of willfully and designedly destroying one's own life. To constitute suicide in the legal sense, the person must be of years of discretion and of sound mind, in which case he is termed a felo-de-se (q. v.). By the English common law the consequences of suicide were deprivation of the rites of Christian burial, the suicide being interred at night at cross-roads, with a stake driven through his breast, and the forfeiture of all his goods and chattels to the Crown, including debts to him at the time of his committing the crime, but not including freehold property, and the forfeiture did not involve corruption of blood. By the statute 33 and 34 Vict., c. 23, the forfeiture of property to the Crown was abolished, and the interment of the suicide at night is not carried out now except on very rare occasions. In the United States suicide has no legal penalties.

"Nor less to be exploded is the word suicide, which may as well seem to participate of sus, a sow, as of the pronoun sui."—Phillips; New World of Words. (Pref. to ed. 3d.)

2. One who commits self-murder; a felo-de-se.

3. Ruin or destruction of one's own interests.

"In countries pretending to civilization there should be no war, much less intestine war, which may be justly called political suicide."—Knox; Letter to a Young Nobleman.

sū-ī-čīd-īc-āl, adj. [English suicid(e); -ical.] Suicidal.

sū-ī-čīd-īsm, s. [Eng. suicid(e); -ism.] A disposition or tendency to suicide.

sū-ī-čīsm, sū-ī-cisme, s. [Lat. sui, genit. of suus=one's own; English suff. -ism.] The seeking of what is personal to one; selfishness, egotism. [ALTRUISM.]

"But his suicisme was so grosse, that any of Ahab's relations (whom he made run out all they had) might read it."—R. Whitlock; Grand Schismatic.

sū-ī-dæ, sū-ī-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. su(s); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ, or neut. -ida.]

1. Zool.: A family of Artiodactyle Mammals, of the Bunodont group (in which the crowns of the molars are tuberculated). The feet have only two functional toes, the other two being much shorter, and hardly touching the ground. Molars, incisors, and canines are present, the last very large, and, in the males, usually constituting formidable tusks projecting from the side of the mouth. The stomach is generally slightly divided, but is by no means so complex as in the Ruminantia. Snout truncated and cylindrical, capable of considerable movement, and adapted for rooting up the ground. The skin is covered with hair to a greater or less extent; tail very short, in some cases rudimentary. The family is divided into three well-marked groups or sub-families: Suinae, True Swine (Sus, Potamochoerus, Babirusa, and Porcula); Dicotylinae (Pecaries, with the single genus Dicotyles, often classed as a family); and Phacochoerinae (Wart-hogs, with one genus, Phacochoerus).

"This . . . sullen the whole body."—Feltham: Resolves, pt. i., res. 48.

sũl'-lẽn-lỹ, adv. [English sullen, a.; -ly.] In a sullen or morose manner; morosely, gloomily, dismally.

"Sullenly, slowly,
The black plague flew o'er it."

Byron: Manfred, iii. 3.

sũl'-lẽn-næss, subst. [Eng. sullen; -ness.] The quality or state of being sullen; silent or gloomy moroseness; sourness of temper.

"The form which her anger assumed was sullenness."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

sũl'-lẽns, s. pl. [SULLEN, a.] A state or fit of sullenness; a morose temper; the sulks.

"He did not love in other days

To wear the sullens on his face."

Præd: County Ball.

sũll'-ěr-ỹ, subst. [Eng. sull; -ery.] A plow-land (q. v.).

sũl'-lẽ-våte, v. t. [Lat. sublevatus, pa. par. of sublevo=to raise up, to support; pref. sub-, and levo=to make light, to lift up; levis=light in weight.] To rouse up, to excite.

"Your white canvas doublet will sully."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., ii. 4.

sũl'-lỹ, sul-leyn, s. [SULLY, v.] A spot, soil, or tarnish. (Fielding: Joseph Andrews, bk. i., ch. iv.)

sũlph-, pref. [SULPHO-.]

sũlph-a-çet'-a-mĩde, s. [Pref. sulph-, and Eng. acetamide.]

Chemistry: Schulze's name for the compound $(C_4H_8S^+O_2)^-N_2$, produced by the action of ammonium sulphide on chloracetamide.

sũlph-a-çet'-ic, adj. [Pref. sulph-, and Eng. acetic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and acetic acid.

sulphacetic-acid, s.

Chemistry: $C_2H_4SO_5 = (C_2H_2SO_3)^+O_2$. Glycolyl-sulphurous acid. A dibasic acid produced by the action of sulphuric anhydride on glacial acetic acid. It forms colorless deliquescent prisms, which melt at 62°, and are very soluble in water, forming an acid solution. Its salts are all soluble in water, but insoluble in alcohol.

sũlph-a-çet'-ỹ-lẽn-ic, a. [Pref. sulph-; Eng. acetylene, and suff. -ic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and acetylene.

sulphacetylenic-acid, s.

Chemistry: $C_2H_4SO_5 = (C_2H_2SO_3)^+O_3$. Isomeric with sulphacetic acid, and obtained by heating argentic sulphate with acetyl chloride to 120°, and treating the product with water. It is a viscid, unstable liquid, and gradually decomposes into sulphuric and acetic acids.

sũlph'-aç-ĩd, s. [SULPHO-ACID.]

sũlph'-a-måte, s. [Eng. sulpham(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of sulphamic acid (q. v.).

sũlph-a-mẽth'-ỹl-åne, s. [Pref. sulph-, Eng. methyl, and suff. -ane.]

Chem.: $CH_5NSO_3 = (SO_2)^+CH_3$ } N } O } Methylic sulphamate. Formed by dissolving methylic sulphate in aqueous ammonia, and crystallizing, by evaporation in a vacuum. It forms large, very deliquescent crystals.

sũlph-ãm'-ic, a. [Pref. sulph-, and Eng. amic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and ammonia.

sulphamic-acid, s.

Chem.: $NH_3SO_3 = NH_2(SO_2)^+H$ } O } Unknown in the free state, but known in its salts. Sulphamate of ammonium, $2NH_3.SO_3$. Sulphatammon, Sulphammon. A white, crystalline powder, obtained by fåte, fåt, fåre, &midst, whåt, fåll, father; wẽ, wět, hẽre, camẽl, hẽr, thẽre; pine, pĩt, sĩre, sĩr, marine; gõ, põt, or, wõre, wõlf, wõrk, whõ, sõn; mũte, cũb, cũre, unĩte, cũr, rũle, fũll; trỹ, Sỹrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

passing dry ammonia gas over a thin layer of sulphuric anhydride. Permanent in air; taste bitter; soluble in nine parts of water, insoluble in alcohol.

sulph-ām'-īde, subst. [Pref. sulph-, and English amide.]

Chem.: $\text{H}_4\text{SO}_2\text{N}_2 = (\text{SO}_2)'' \text{N}_2$. Produced, according to Regnault, when dry ammonia gas is passed over sulphuric chloride.

sulph-ām-i-dōn'-īc, a. [English -sulph(uric); amidon; and suff. -ic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and amidon.

sulphamidonic-acid, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_{24}\text{H}_{48}\text{O}_{24}\text{S}_3(?)$. A syrupy deliquescent acid, produced by triturating starch with strong sulphuric acid. Its salts are all amorphous, deliquescent, easily soluble in water, and very unstable. (Watts.)

sulph-ām-mōn, sulph-at-ām-mōn, s. [Pref. sulph-, or sulphat(o)-, and English ammon(ium).] [SULPHAMIC-ACID.]

sulph-a-mŷl'-īc, a. [Pref. sulph-, and English amylic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and amylic alcohol.

sulphamylic-acid, s.

Chem.: $(\text{C}_5\text{H}_{11})\text{HSO}_4$. Amylsulphuric acid. A colorless, thin syrup, obtained by allowing a mixture of sulphuric acid and amylic alcohol to stand in a cool place till water no longer separates amylic alcohol from it. It has an acid, bitter taste, and is very soluble in water and alcohol, the aqueous solution decomposing spontaneously into amylic alcohol and sulphuric acid.

sul-phān, s. [Eng. sulpha(te), and (oxyge)n.] Chem.: Sulphatoxygen. Graham's name for the radical SO_4 .

sulph-a-nē-thīc, adj. [Pref. sulph-; English aneth(ol), and suff. -ic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and anethol.

sulphanethic-acid, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_{10}\text{H}_{14}\text{O}_4\text{SO}_4(?)$. Sulphanetholic acid. Obtained by the action of strong sulphuric acid on anise-camphor. Its soluble salts are colored deep violet by ferric solution.

sulph-a-nē-thōl'-īc, a. [SULPHANETHIC.]

sulph-a-nīl'-īc, a. [Pref. sulph-, and English anilic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and aniline.

sulphanilic-acid, s.

Manuf. Chem.: $\text{C}_6\text{H}_7\text{NSO}_3 = \text{NH}(\text{C}_6\text{H}_5)(\text{SO}_2)'' \text{O}$.

Phenyl-sulphamic acid. Formed by the action of sulphuric acid on aniline, or on oxanilide. It crystallizes from hot water in shining rhombic plates, soluble in boiling water, slightly soluble in cold water, still less soluble in alcohol, insoluble in a mixture of alcohol and ether. Heated with a solid caustic alkali, it gives off aniline, leaving an alkaline sulphate. Its salts are soluble and crystallizable.

sulph-ar-sīn, s. [Pref. sulph(o)-; English arsenic; and suff. -in.] [SULPHIDE OF CACODYL.]

sulph-at-ām-mōn, s. [SULPHAMMON.]

sulph-ate, s. [Eng. sulph(uric); -ate.]

1. Chem. & Min.: A salt of sulphuric acid.

¶ Sulphate of alumina = Alunogen; Sulphate of ammonia = Mascagnite; Sulphate of barium = Barytes; Sulphate of cobalt = Bieberite; Sulphate of copper = Chalcantite; Sulphate of iron = Melanterite; Sulphate of lead = Anglesite; Sulphate of lime = Anhydrite and Gypsum; Sulphate of nickel = Morenosite; Sulphate of potash = Aphthitalite; Sulphate of potash and ammonia = Taylorite; Sulphate of soda = Mirabilite and Thenardite; Sulphate of strontian = Celestine; Sulphate of uranium = Johannite and Voglianite; Sulphate of uranium and lime = Medjadite; Sulphate of zinc = Goslarite.

2. Pharm., &c.: Various sulphates are used in medicine. (See the elements, with which the sulphates are combined.)

sul-phāt'-īc, adj. [Eng. sulphat(e); -ic; French sulfatique.]

Chem.: Of, belonging to, containing, or resembling a sulphate.

sulph-a-tīte, s. [Eng. sulph(ur); at connect., and suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. schwefelsäure.]

Min.: Native sulphuric acid (q. v.). (Dana.)

sul-phā-tō, prefix. [SULPHATE.] Sulphatic (q. v.).

sulphato-carbonate of barytes, s.

Min.: A variety of witherite (q. v.), containing a sulphate. Now shown to be a result of partial alteration (Thomson.)

sulphato-carbonate of lead, s. [LANARKITE.]

sulphato-chloride of copper, subst. [CONNELLITE.]

sulphato-tricarbonate of lead, s. [LEADHILLITE, SUSANNITE.]

sulph-at-ōx'-ŷ-gēn, s. [Pref. sulphat(o)-, and Eng. oxygen.] [SULPHAN.]

sulph-āz'-ō-tīsed, adj. [Pref. sulph-, and Eng. azotised.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and azote or nitrogen.

sulphazotised-acids, s. pl.

Chem.: A series of acids, the salts of which are formed by the action of sulphurous anhydride upon a solution of potassium, sodium, or ammonium nitrite, containing a large excess of free alkali. The potassium salts may be represented by the following formulae: Sulphazite of potassium = $3\text{K}_2\text{O} \cdot \text{S}_2\text{H}_6\text{N}_2\text{O}_{12}$; sulphazate of potassium = $3\text{K}_2\text{O} \cdot \text{S}_4\text{H}_6\text{N}_2\text{O}_{14}$; sulphazotate of potassium = $3\text{K}_2\text{O} \cdot \text{S}_5\text{H}_6\text{N}_2\text{O}_{16}$.

sulph-īde, s. [Eng. sulph(ydric); -ide.]

Chem. & Min.: A neutral salt of sulphydric acid. ¶ Sulphide of arsenic = Orpiment and Realgar; Sulphide of antimony = Stibnite; Sulphide of bismuth = Bismuthinite; Sulphide of cadmium = Greenockite; Sulphide of copper = Vitreous-copper; Sulphide of iron = Troilite; Sulphide of lead = Galena; Sulphide of manganese = Alabandite; Sulphide of mercury = Cinnabar; Sulphide of molybdenum = Molybdenite; Sulphide of nickel = Millerite; Sulphide of silver = Argentite and Akanthite; Sulphide of silver and copper = Stromeyerite; Sulphide of zinc = Blende and Wurtzite.

sulphide of cacodyl, s.

Chem.: $\text{As}_2(\text{CH}_3)_4\text{S}$. Sulpharsin. Formed by adding barium sulphide to crude cacodyl. It is a transparent liquid, fluid at 40° , and boiling at 100° .

sulphide of chlorine, s.

Chem.: Cl_2S_2 . Prepared by passing dry chlorine gas into a retort in which sulphur is sublimed, and collecting the distillate in a receiver surrounded by cold water. It is a mobile reddish-yellow liquid, having a penetrating, disagreeable odor, and fuming strongly in the air. Specific gravity 1.687; boils at 139° .

sulphide of iron, s. [FERROUS-SULPHIDE.]

sulph-in-di-gōt'-īc, a. [Pref. sulph-, and Eng. indigotic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and indigotine.

sulphindigotic-acid, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_{16}\text{H}_{10}\text{N}_2\text{O}_2 \cdot 2\text{SO}_3 = \text{C}_{16}\text{H}_8(\text{SO}_2 \cdot \text{OH})_2\text{N}_2\text{O}_2$. Sulphindyllic acid. A deep blue pasty mass, obtained by heating one part of indigo with fifteen parts concentrated sulphuric acid for three days, at 40° to 50° . It is soluble in water and alcohol, and is used in dyeing.

sulph-in-dŷl'-īc, adj. [Pref. sulph-; English ind(igo); and suff. -yl, -ic.] [SULPHINDIGOTIC.]

sul-phīn'-īc, a. [Eng. sulph(ur), in connect., and suff. -ic.] Containing, derived from, or pertaining to hyposulphurous acid.

sulphinic-acids, s. pl.

Chem.: Compounds analogous to sulphonic acids or acid ethers of hyposulphurous acid. Formed by the action of sulphur dioxide on the zinc compounds of the alcohol radicals. Methyl sulphinic acid = CH_3SO_2 .

sulph-ī-ōn, s. [Eng. sulph(ur), and -ion (q. v.).]

Chem.: SO_4 . A term applied in electro-chemistry to a supposed radical, resulting from the electrolysis of sulphuric acid, H_2SO_4 , the hydrogen being carried to the negative electrode, and sulphion set free; this, however, being immediately broken up into $\text{SO}_3 + \text{O}$, the latter passing over to the positive electrode.

sulph-is'-a-tīn, s. [SULPHISATYDE.]

sulph-is'-a-tŷde, sulph-is'-a-tīn, subst. [Pref. sulph-, and Eng. isatyde, isatin.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_{16}\text{H}_{12}\text{N}_2\text{O}_2\text{S}_2$. A grayish-yellow powder obtained by passing sulphydric acid into an alcoholic solution of isatine, filtering, and precipitating by the addition of water. It is soluble in alcohol, insoluble in water.

sulph-īte, s. [Eng. sulph(urous); -ite.]

Chem.: A salt of sulphurous acid.

sul-phō, sulph-, pref. [SULPHUR.] Of, belonging to, or containing sulphur.

sulpho-acid, s.

Chem.: An acid in which the oxygen is replaced by sulphur; thus, from cyanic acid, CONH , sulphocyanic acid, CSNH , is obtained.

Chem.: A base in which the oxygen is replaced by sulphur; K_2O becomes K_2S .

sulpho-compounds, s. pl.

Chem.: Compounds of organic radicals with sulphuric and sulphurous anhydride, as sulphonic and sulphinic acids (q. v.).

sulpho-naphthalidamic-acid, s. [NAPHTHONIC-ACID.]

sulpho-purpuric-acid, s.

Chem.: $2\text{C}_8\text{H}_5\text{NO} \cdot \text{SO}_3$. Sulphophœnic acid. Indigo-purple. A purple-red powder obtained by mixing one part indigo-blue with eight parts strong sulphuric acid, keeping it at a temperature of 60° for three days, diluting with water, filtering, washing the residue with dilute hydrochloric acid, and drying on an oil bath at 100° . It is slightly soluble in water, but very soluble in sulphuric acid.

sulpho-quinic acid, s. [QUININE SULPHURIC-ACID.]

sulpho-salt, s. [SULPHUR-SALT.]

sul-phō-bēn-zām'-īc, a. [Eng. sulphobenzamide; -ic.] Derived from or contained in sulphobenzamide.

sulphobenzamic-acid, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_7\text{H}_7\text{NSO}_4 = (\text{C}_7\text{H}_4\text{SO}_3)'' \text{N}$. A monobasic acid produced by heating sulphobenzamide in strong potash lye for some hours in a water bath.

It crystallizes in rhombohedral crystals or needles, insoluble in cold water, slightly soluble in ether, but soluble in hot water and in alcohol; melts above 100° , and solidifies on cooling in a crystalline mass. Its salts are all more or less soluble in water.

sul-phō-bēn'-zā-mīde, s. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. benzamide.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_7\text{H}_8\text{N}_2\text{SO}_3 = (\text{C}_7\text{H}_4\text{SO}_3)'' \text{N}_2$. Obtained by treating sulphobenzoic chloride with strong ammonia. It dissolves readily in hot water and hot alcohol, melts at 170° , and is slowly decomposed at 270° – 290° .

sul-phō-bēn'-zīde, subst. [Pref. sulpho-, Eng. benz(ol), and suff. -ide.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_{12}\text{H}_{10}\text{SO}_2$. A compound formed by the action of sulphuric anhydride on benzol, and treating the product with a large quantity of water. It crystallizes in rhombic plates, insoluble in water and in alkalies, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 128° , and boils at a much higher temperature.

sul-phō-bēn-zō'-īc, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. benzoic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric and benzoic acids.

sulphobenzoic-acid, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_7\text{H}_6\text{O}_5\text{S} = \text{C}_6\text{H}_4 \cdot \text{SO}_2 \cdot \text{OH} \cdot \text{CO} \cdot \text{OH}$. A monobasic, aromatic, deliquescent acid, formed by heating benzoic acid with Nordhausen sulphuric acid, or by passing the vapor of sulphuric anhydride over dry benzoic acid. It is obtained in strongly-acid crystalline masses readily soluble in water.

sul-phō-car-bām'-īc, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. carbamic.] Derived from or containing sulphur, carbon, and ammonia.

sulphocarbamic-acid, s.

Chem.: CH_3NS_2 . A reddish, oily liquid obtained by passing ammoniacal gas into carbon disulphide, and decomposing the salt formed with hydrochloric acid. It solidifies at ordinary temperatures to a crystalline mass, which soon decomposes into sulphocyanic and hydric sulphide.

sul-phō-çŷ'-ān-āte, s. [Eng. sulphocyan(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of cyanic acid.

sulphocyanate of potassium, s.

Chem.: CNKS . Obtained by gradually heating to low redness a mixture of dried potassium, ferrocyanide, sulphur, and pure potassium carbonate, exhausting with water, and evaporating the aqueous solution to dryness. It crystallizes in long, slender, colorless prisms, soluble in water and alcohol, and deliquesces when exposed to a moist atmosphere.

sul-phō-çŷ'-ān'-īc, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. cyanic.] Containing cyanic acid and sulphur.

sulphocyanic-acid, s.

Chem.: HCNS . Hydrogen sulphocyanate. A monobasic acid obtained by decomposing lead sulphocyanate suspended in water, with sulphureted hydrogen. It is a colorless, very acid liquid, with a pungent acetous odor, and solidifies at -12.5° to hexagonal plates. Heated to 100° it boils, but the greater part suffers decomposition. It colors ferric salts an intense blood-red, and on this account is used, in the form of any of its soluble salts, to detect traces of iron.

sul-phō-çŷ'-ān'-ō-gēn, s. [Eng. (per)sulphocyanogen.]

Chemistry: The old name for persulphocyanogen (q. v.).

sul-phō-dra-cōn'-īc, adj. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. draconic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and draconic.

bōl, bōŷ; pōūt, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, thī; sin, aŷ; expect, Xēnophon, exīst. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; tīon, -ŷion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

sulphodraconic-acid, s.

Chem.: A conjugated acid produced, according to Laurent, by treating oil of anise or tarragon with a large excess of sulphuric acid.

sul'-phō-form, s. [Prefix sulpho-, and English form.]

Chem.: An oily liquid produced in small quantity by distilling iodoform with mercuric sulphide. (Bouchardat.) sul'-phō-glū'-cic, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and English glucic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric and glucic acids.

sulphoglucic-acid, s.

Chem.: $(C_6H_{12}O_6)_4SO_3$. Sulphosaccharic acid; an unstable acid formed by treating glucose with strong sulphuric acid. It is obtained in the form of a liquid having a sour and sweet taste, and which does not precipitate barium salts.

sul'-phō-glū-tin'-ic, a. [Pref. sulpho-; English glutin; and suff. -ic.] (For def. see compound.)

sulphoglutinic-acid, s.

Chem.: A glutinous acid formed, together with other products, by the action of sulphuric anhydride in excess, on naphthalene. (Berzelius.) sul'-phō-hīp-pūr'-ic, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. hippuric.] Derived from or containing sulphuric and hippuric acids.

sulphohippuric-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_9H_9NO_3SO_3$. Formed by treating hippuric acid with sulphuric anhydride. By decomposing its lead salt with sulphydric acid it is obtained as a brown amorphous deliquescent mass. It is dibasic, its neutral barium salt having the composition, $C_9H_7BaNO_3SO_3$.

sulph-ō-lē'-ic, adj. [Pref. sulpho-, and English oleic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric and oleic acids.

sulpholeic-acid, s.

Chem.: An oily acid, similar to and produced in the same way as sulphomargaric acid, and not separable from it (q. v.).

sul'-phō-līg'-nīc, a. [LIGNOSULPHURIC.]

sul'-phō-mān-nīt'-ic, adj. [Prefix sulpho-, and Eng. mannitic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and mannite.

sulphomannitic-acid, s.

Chemistry: $C_6H_{14}O_6(SO_3)$. An acid produced by dissolving mannite in strong sulphuric acid. It appears to be tribasic, forming deliquescent salts with the alkalies, and a crystalline salt with baryta. (Watts.) sul'-phō-mar-gār'-ic, adj. [Prefix sulpho-, and Eng. margaric.] Derived from or containing sulphuric and margaric acids.

sulphomargaric-acid, a.

Chemistry: An oily acid, produced, according to Fremy, by the action of strong sulphuric acid on olein at low temperatures. It separates as an oil from the acid liquid, but is soluble in both water and alcohol, as are its salts of the alkalies.

sul'-phō-mēl-lōn'-ic, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. mellonic.] Derived from or containing sulphydric acid and mellone.

sulphomellonic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_3H_4N_4S_2=CyH_2N_2(CyHS)$. Obtained as a potassium salt by boiling persulphocyanogen with sulphhydrate of potassium. It is separated from sulphur by treatment with aqueous ammonia and afterward purified by animal charcoal. It forms small colorless needles, tasteless, nearly insoluble in cold water, alcohol, and ether, but slightly soluble in boiling water. It is monobasic, the potassium salt, $C_3N_4H_3KS_2$, forming colorless shining prisms soluble in water and alcohol.

sul'-phō-mē-thy'-ic, adj. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. methylic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and methyl.

sulphomethylic-acid, s.

Chem.: $(CH_3)HSO_4$. Methylsulphuric acid, produced when one part of wood spirit is added to two parts of sulphuric acid, and obtained pure by decomposing its barium salt with sulphuric acid. It forms colorless needles soluble in water and alcohol, and combines with the alkaline and metallic bases to form salts. The barium salt, $(CH_3)_2Ba(SO_4)_2+2OH_2$, is obtained in beautiful nacreous tables or laminae, very soluble in water.

sul'-phō-nāph'-thā-lēne, s. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. naphthalene.]

Chem.: $\begin{matrix} C_{10}H_7 \\ C_{10}H_7 \end{matrix} SO_2$. Obtained by acting on an excess of fused naphthalene with the vapor of sulphuric anhydride. It crystallizes from its alcoholic solution in tasteless, inodorous nodules, melts at 70°, is slightly soluble in water, more soluble in boiling alcohol.

sul'-phōn'-ic, a. [Eng. sulph(ur); Gr. (thei)on=brimstone, and suff. -ic.] Containing sulphurous acid.

sulphonic-acids, s. pl.

Chem.: Acid ethers of sulphurous acid in which one of the bonds of sulphur is united to the carbon of the organic radical, as methylsulphonic acid CH_3SO_3 . They are formed by treating the haloid ethers with solution of sodium sulphite.

sul'-phō-phēn'-ic, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. phenic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and phenol.

sulphophenic-acid, s.

Chem.: $(C_6H_5)HSO_4=(C_6H_4)OH\cdot SO_3H$. Phenylsulphuric acid. Prepared by treating phenol with strong sulphuric acid, converting the compound into the barium salt, and, after purification, decomposing it with an equivalent of sulphuric acid. Evaporated in a vacuum, it may be obtained in needle-shaped crystals. It forms well-defined but unimportant crystalline salts with the alkalies and metals.

sul'-phō-phē-nyl'-a-mīde, s. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. phenylamide.]

Chem.: $\begin{matrix} C_6H_5SO_2 \\ H_2 \end{matrix} \} N$. Produced by the action of sulphophenylic chloride on ammonia. The product is washed with cold water to dissolve out chloride of ammonia, and the residual compound crystallized from a small quantity of boiling alcohol. It is obtained in splendid nacreous scales, melting at 153°; insoluble in cold water, easily soluble in alcohol, and capable of combining with metals or organic radicals.

sul'-phō-phē-nyl'-ic, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. phenylic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and phenyl.

sulphophenylic-chloride, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_5(SO_2)Cl$. Produced by adding to sodic phenylsulphite small quantities of oxychloride of phosphorus until a syrup is formed, distilling the product, rectifying the distillate, and collecting the portion boiling at 254°. It is a colorless, strongly-refracting oil, having the odor of bitter-almond oil and a specific gravity of 1.378 at 23°.

sul'-pho-phlōr-ām'-ic, a. [Pref. sulpho-; Eng. phloram(ine), and suff. -ic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and phloramine.

sulphophloramic-acid, s.

Chem.: Produced by treating phloramine with strong sulphuric acid, converting the compound into a barium salt and decomposing with sulphuric acid. It forms colorless needles, yielding a deep-violet color with ferric chloride, even in very dilute solutions.

sul'-phō-phlō-rēt'-ic, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. phloretic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric and phloretic acids.

sulphophloretic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_9H_{10}SO_6$. Produced by the action of sulphuric anhydride on phloretic acid. It forms a very sour syrup, easily soluble in water and alcohol, and forming crystalline salts with baryta and lime.

sul'-phō-sāc-chār'-ic, adj. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. saccharic.] A synonym of sulphoglucic (q. v.).

sul'-phō-sāl-ī-çyl'-ic, adj. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. salicylic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric and salicylic acids.

sulphosalicylic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_7H_6O_3(SO_3)$. Produced by the action of sulphuric anhydride on perfectly dry salicylic acid. It crystallizes in long thin needles which dissolve in all proportions in alcohol, water, and ether, and melt at 120°. It is a strong permanent acid, dissolving zinc with evolution of hydrogen, and forms neutral and acid salts, nearly all of which are soluble in water, and produce a deep violet coloration with ferric salts.

sul'-phō-sāl-ī-çyl'-ōl', subst. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. salicytol.]

Chem.: C_7H_6OS . Thiosalicyl; a pulverulent substance produced by the action of sulphydric acid on hydro-salicylamide in alcoholic solution. It forms salts with the alkalies, and colors ferric salts violet-red.

sul'-phō-sīn-āp'-ic, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. sinapic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and sinapic acid.

sulphosinapic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_3H_5CNSH_2S$. Known only in combination with a base. Its salts are formed by the direct union of allylic sulphocyanate with a metallic sulphhydrate, as in the case of the potassium compound $(C_3H_5)CNSKHS$, which is obtained in large transparent rhombic crystals, readily decomposing on exposure to the air.

sul'-phō-stān'-nāte, s. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. stannate.]

Chem. (pl.): Tin sulphides.

sul'-phō-sūc-çin'-ic, a. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. succinic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric anhydride and succinic acid.

sulphosuccinic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_2H_3 \begin{matrix} \{ COOH \\ SO_3H \\ COOH \end{matrix}$. A tribasic acid produced by exposing succinic acid to the vapor of sulphuric anhydride for several hours. The acid thus obtained forms mammillated crystals very soluble in water, alcohol, and ether. It forms salts with the alkalies and metallic bases, some of which are crystallizable.

sul'-phō-tōl-ū-ōl'-a-mīde, s. [Pref. sulpho-, and Eng. toluolamide.]

Chem.: $C_7H_7SO_2 \begin{matrix} \{ SO_3H \\ H_2 \end{matrix} \} N$. Formed in the same way as sulphophenylamide, and obtained in needles or laminae.

sul'-phō-vīn'-ic, adj. [Pref. sulpho-; English vin(yl), and suff. -ic.] Derived from or containing sulphuric acid and vinous alcohol.

sulphovinic-acid, s. [ETHYL SULPHURIC ACID.]

sul'-phūr, s. [Lat. sulphur, sulfur; Sansc. sulvari; Dut. sulfor; Fr. souffré; Prov. sofre, solpre; Sp. azufre; Ital. solfo, zolfo.]

1. Chem.: Symbol S. Atomic weight=32. A hexad non-metallic element, found native in many volcanic districts, and largely distributed through the mineral kingdom. It is purified by distillation in an iron still, the sulphur being received either in a brick chamber, when it is called flowers of sulphur, or condensed in the liquid state, and then cast into sticks. It occurs in several allotropic forms, namely, the octohedral, monoclinic, amorphous, and plastic varieties. It is a very brittle solid, of lemon-yellow color, tasteless, almost inodorous, insoluble in water, but soluble in carbon disulphide, oil of turpentine, and benzol, and to a slight extent in hot alcohol, and has in the crystalline state a specific gravity=2.05. It melts at 114-120°, boils at 440°, evolving an orange-colored vapor, and combines directly with the great majority of the elements. In its chemical relations it resembles oxygen, and is interchangeable with it by double decomposition of their respective compounds. It is inflammable in air or oxygen, burning with a clear blue flame, being converted into sulphurous oxide, SO_2 .

† Various fruits, seeds, and bulbs, as radish, turnip, &c., derive their flavor from oils having sulphur in their composition.

2. Engrav.: A term applied to impressions taken by the goldsmiths of the sixteenth century from the engravings executed on plate, paxes, &c., and obtained by spreading a layer of melted sulphur on the face of the plate, producing a cast in relief of the lines engraved. They are extremely rare.

3. Min.: A mineral occurring in nature in crystals belonging to the orthorhombic system, also massive. Hardness, 1.5-2.5; specific gravity, 2.072; luster, resinous; streak, sulphur-yellow; brittle. Occurs in magnificent crystals in the Sicilian mines, and formerly near Cadiz, Spain. Found in abundance in the regions of extinct and active volcanoes, and in hydrothermal districts.

4. Pharm.: Sublimed sulphur is given internally as a stimulant in chronic diseases of the skin, as impetigo and prurigo, also in chronic bronchitis, piles, and mercurial ptyalism, and to children as a mild laxative. Used externally it kills animal and vegetable parasites, as the acarus of itch, &c.

*† Stones of sulphur: Thunderbolts.

"The gods throw stones of sulphur on me."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, v. 5.

sulphur-acids, s. pl.

Chem.: The sulphides of the more electro-negative metals, arsenic, antimony, &c.

sulphur-bases, s. pl.

Chem.: The sulphides of the more electro-positive metals, potassium, barium, and copper.

sulphur-bottom whale, s.

Zoöl.: Balenoptera sulfureus, from the Pacific. Its specific and popular names are derived from its yellowish belly.

sulphur-colored, a. Pale lively yellow, with a mixture of white. (Lindley.) sulphur-ore, s. A popular name for iron pyrites, from which is obtained a considerable portion of the sulphur of commerce.

sulphur-oxides, s. pl.

Chem.: Sulphur forms two oxides, viz., sulphurous anhydride, SO_2 , and sulphuric anhydride, SO_3 . SO_2 is produced by burning sulphur in air or oxygen. At common temperatures it is a gas, but under a fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīre; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

pressure of three atmospheres it is converted into a liquid, and, by the aid of a freezing mixture, into semicrystalline flakes. The solid, SO_2 , melts at -79° , and the liquid oxide boils at -10° . Its specific gravity = 1.45, and it is irrespirable and incombustible. Sulphuric oxide is obtained by the oxidation of sulphurous anhydride, and crystallizes in beautiful white slender needles. In the liquid state it forms a liquid thinner than oil of vitriol. It boils at 35° , and has a specific gravity of 1.97.

sulphur-rain, subst. Pollen from the Pinaceæ, Amentaceæ, &c., which has been floating in the atmosphere, and is brought to the ground by rain.

sulphur-salts, s. pl.

Chem.: Compounds of sulphur acids and sulphur bases, e. g., sulpharsenate of potassium, $3\text{K}_2\text{S}^+\text{AsS}_5 = 2\text{K}_3\text{AsS}_5$.

sulphur-springs, s. pl.

Phys. Geog.: Hot springs in which sulphur is mixed with the water. They usually occur in volcanic districts of intermittent activity. The sulphur-springs of Rotomahana, New Zealand, were destroyed by an eruption in June, 1886.

sul'-phu-rate, a. [Eng. sulphur; -ate.] Of or pertaining to sulphur; of the color of sulphur; resembling sulphur.

"A pale sulphurate color."—More: Mystery of Godliness, p. 189.

sul'-phu-râ-te, v. t. [SULPHURATE, a.] To impregnate or combine with sulphur; to subject to the action of sulphur.

sul'-phu-râ-tion, sul'-fū-râ-tion, s. [SULPHURATE, v.]

1. The act of dressing or anointing with sulphur.

"Charms, sulfurations, dippings in the sea, sittings all day on the ground."—Bentley: On Free-Thinking, § 50.

2. The same as SULPHURING (q. v.).

sul'-phu-râ-tōr, s. [Eng. sulphurat(e); -or.] An apparatus for impregnating with or exposing to the action of sulphur; specific, an apparatus for fumigating or bleaching by means of the fumes of burning sulphur.

sul-phūr'-ē-ā, s. [SULPHUR.]

Chem.: CSN_2H_4 . Sulpho-carbonyl diamide. Obtained by heating dry ammoniac sulpho-cyanate slowly to 170° , keeping at that temperature for several hours, cooling to 100° , dissolving in an equal weight of water at 80° , filtering, and allowing the filtrate to crystallize. It forms small prisms, soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether, and fuses at 149° .

sul'-phu-rē-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. sulphur; -eity.] The quality or state of being sulphureous. (Ben Jonson: Alchemist, ii. 1.)

sul-phūr'-ē-ōūs, adj. [Lat. sulphureus, sulfureus.] Consisting of sulphur; having the qualities of sulphur or brimstone; impregnated with sulphur; sulphurous.

"And dart destruction in sulphureous showers."

Byron: Elegy on Newstead Abbey.

sul-phūr'-ē-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. sulphureous; -ly.] In a sulphureous manner.

"A town low in its situation, and sulphureously shaded by the high and barren mountain Cabobarra, whose brazen front scorches this miserable place."—Sir T. Herbert: Travels, p. 35.

sul-phūr'-ē-ōūs-nēss, s. [Eng. sulphureous; -ness.] The quality or state of being sulphureous.

sul'-phu-rēt, s. [Eng. sulph(ur); -uret.] [SULPHIDE.]

sul'-phu-rēt-ted, a. [Eng. sulphuret; -ed.] Containing a sulphuret or sulphide.

sulphuretted-hydrogen, s. [HYDROGEN-SULPHIDE.]

sulphuretted-waters, s. pl.

Chem.: Hot or cold mineral waters holding in solution sulphides or free sulphuretted hydrogen. They are stimulant, diaphoretic, and alterative. The sulphuretted hydrogen imparts to them a nauseous odor like that of rotten eggs. The chief thermal sulphuretted waters are those of Aix-la-Chapelle, Baden, near Vienna, Aix-les-bains, &c.; the chief cold ones are Harrogate and Bocklet. Such baths are recommended in cutaneous, hepatic, uterine, rheumatic, gouty, neuralgic, and other diseases.

sul-phūr'-ic, a. [Eng. sulphur; -ic.] Derived from or containing sulphur.

sulphuric-acid, s.

1. Chem.: SO_2HO . Oil of vitriol. Produced commercially by burning sulphur in atmospheric air, and passing the sulphurous oxide formed into a lead chamber along with the vapor of nitric acid. A reaction takes place between the two; the sulphurous oxide becomes oxidized into sulphuric oxide, the nitric compound being reduced to nitric oxide, which again becomes oxidized, and acts as a carrier of oxygen between the sulphurous and sulphuric oxides. On evaporation in leaden pans it reaches a specific gravity of about 1.7, but on further concentration in a platinum retort it forms normal sulphuric acid having a specific gravity of 1.842. It is a heavy, oily, colorless, inodorous liquid, boils at 327° , and freezes at -35° . The addition of water to the strong acid in the proportion of 1 to 4 raises the temperature of the mixture from 0° to 100° . In many cases organic substances are broken up or destroyed by it, as in the case of sugar and allied substances.

2. Min.: [SULFATITE].

3. Pharm.: It is a very powerful caustic; when much diluted it acts as a refrigerant, tonic, and astringent.

sul'-phu-rine, adj. [Eng. sulphur; -ine.] Pertaining to or resembling sulphur; sulphureous (q. v.).

sul'-phūr-īng, s. [Eng. sulphur; -ing.]

1. Bleaching: A process of bleaching by exposure to the fumes of sulphur. It is adopted with straw-braid, straw hats, silks, woollens, &c. Sulphurous acid is the bleaching agent, and may be applied by means of a watery solution.

2. Calico-printing: The process of exposing printed calicoes to sulphurous acid fumes. It is an incident in fixing of steam-colors.

sul'-phu-roūs, a. [Fr. sulphureux, from Lat. sulphureosus, sulfureosus.] Consisting of, containing, or impregnated with sulphur; resembling sulphur; having the qualities of sulphur; sulphureous.

"Edinburgh and Leith into the air were blown With powders sulphurous smoke."

Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 29.

sulphurous-acid, s.

1. Chem.: $\text{SO}(\text{HO})_2$. Produced by passing sulphurous oxide into water. The hydrated solid acid is formed by passing moist sulphurous oxide into a freezing mixture. Water at 15° dissolves forty-five times its volume of sulphurous oxide, forming the sulphurous acid of commerce. It then has a specific gravity of 1.04, is colorless, and has the smell of burning sulphur. It possesses bleaching properties.

2. Pharm.: It is not often given internally, except in the form of spray to remove the fetid sordes gathering in the mouth in malignant fevers. Externally it destroys vegetable life, and is of use in tinea, favus, and fetid sores.

sulphurous-chloride, s.

Chem.: SOCl_2 . A compound derived from sulphurous acid by the substitution of chlorine for hydroxyl. It is a colorless, strongly-refracting liquid, and boils at 82° .

†sulphurous-waters, s. pl. [SULPHURETTED-WATERS.]

sul'-phūr-wōrt, s. [Eng. sulphur, and wort.] So called, according to Gerard, because the roots have a yellow sap, which, when hard and dry, smells like sulphur.

Bot.: Peucedanum officinale.

sul'-phūr-ŷ, sul'-phūr-īe, adj. [English sulphur; -y.] Partaking of the nature or qualities of sulphur; sulphureous.

"Jove . . . Ida covered all

With sulphuric clouds."

Chapman: Homer's Iliad, xvii.

sul'-phūr-ŷl, s. [Eng. sulphur; -yl.]

Chem.: SO_2 . The radical of sulphuric acid and its derivatives.

sulph-ŷ'-drate, s. [Eng. sulphydr(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of sulphydric acid.

sulph-ŷ'-dric, adj. [Pref. sulp(h)-, and English hydric.] (See compound.) Containing sulphur and hydrogen.

sulphydric-acid, s. [HYDROGEN-SULPHIDE.]

Sul-pi'-cian, Sul-pi'-tŷan (ti as sh), s. [See def.]

Church Hist. (pl.): A congregation of secular priests, founded in 1645 by Jean Jacques Olier de Verneuil, parish priest of St. Sulpice, Paris. The members are specially devoted to training candidates for the priesthood. The congregation was suppressed by Napoleon in 1812, and reestablished at the Restoration. Besides their seminaries in France, the Sulpicians have establishments at Montreal, Baltimore, and other places in this country.

sul'-tān, s. [Fr., from Arab. sultān=victorious, a ruler, a prince.] The ordinary title of a Mohammedan sovereign, specif. applied to the Emperor of Turkey.

"The uplifted spear

Of their great sultan waving to direct Their course."

Milton: P. L., i. 348.

sultan-flower, s.

Bot.: Amberboa; a genus of Centauriæ. The Sweet or Purple Sultan-flower is Amberboa moschata, and the Yellow Sultan-flower A. odorata.

sul'-ta'-nā, s. [Ital. sultana, fem. of sultano=a sultan.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The wife of a sultan; the empress of the Turks.

*2. A mistress.

"While Charles flirted with his three sultanas."—Ma-caulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

3. A kind of raisin.

II. Ornith.: Porphyrio martinica. It is an elegant bird, slenderer than a common fowl, with dark, metallic plumage, and a black and white tail.

"That the sultana could be easily domesticated is probable."—Gosse: Birds of Jamaica, p. 379.

sultana-bird, s. [SULTANA, II.]

sul'-tān-ate, s. [Eng. sultan; -ate.] The rule or dominion of a sultan; sultanish.

sul'-tān-ēss, s. [Eng. sultan; -ess.] The same as SULTANA, I. 1.

sul'-tān-ic, a. [Eng. sultan; -ic.] Of or pertaining to a sultan; imperial.

sul'-tān-in, s. [Arab.]

1. A former Turkish money of account, worth 120 aspers; also a small gold coin, worth $2.43.

2. The Venetian gold sequin.

sul'-tān-rŷ, s. [Eng. sultan; -ry.] The dominion of a sultan.

"I affirm the same of the sultanry of the Mamalukes."—Bacon: Holy War.

sul'-tān-ship, subst. [Eng. sultan; -ship.] The office, position, or rank of a sultan.

sul'-tān-ŷ, s. [Eng. sultan; -y.] A sultanry (q. v.).

sul'-trī-lŷ, adv. [Eng. sultry; -ly.] Oppressively; so as to cause or suffer faintness.

"Earth turned in her sleep with pain

Sultrily suspired for proof."

R. Browning: A Serenade at the Villa.

sul'-trī-nēss, s. [Eng. sultry; -ness.] The quality or state of being sultry; close and moist heat.

"'Twas sweet of yore to see it play,

And chase the sultriness of day."

Byron: The Giaour.

sul'-trŷ, sul-trie, a. [Properly sweltry, for sweltery, from swelter, a frequent. from Mid. Eng. swelten=to die, to faint, from A. S. sweltan=to die; cogn. with Icel. svelta=to die, to starve (pa. t. svalt, pl. sultu); Dan. sulte; Sw. svälta; Goth. swiltan.] [SWELTER.]

1. Very hot, burning, and oppressive.

"Beneath Batavia's sultry sky."

Scott: Marmion, iii. (Introd.)

2. Very hot, close, and moist; close with moist heat; heavy, sweltering.

"Squalls, attended with rain and hot sultry weather."

—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. i., ch. i.

sulz'-ēr-ite (z as tz), s. [After Sulz, Wurtemberg, where found, er connect., and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as STRONTIANITE (q. v.).

sūm, somme, summe, s. [O. Fr. somme; Fr. somme, from Lat. summa=the sum, chief part, amount, prop. fem. sing. of summus=highest, greatest for (supmus), superlative of superus=that which is above; super=above; Sp. súma; Ital. somma.]

1. The aggregate of two or more numbers, magnitudes, quantities, or particulars; the aggregate amount of any number of individual parts or particulars added together, as 7 is the sum of 3 and 4.

"You know how much the gross sum of deuce-ace amounts to."—Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, i. 2.

¶ In Algebra the term sum does not necessarily imply increase; for, if we aggregate several quantities, some of which are positive and some negative, it may happen that the sum is numerically less than any one of the parts; it may even be 0. This sum is therefore distinguished as the algebraic sum. [SUBTRACTION.]

2. Hence, the whole quantity or amount; the total.

"The sum and substance that I have."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, iv. 1.

3. The whole abstracted; the principal or main points or thoughts viewed together; the amount, the substance, the essence, the upshot, the effect.

"This is the hole summe and effects of this hole chapter, though he trifle wyth other things betwene."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 562.

4. A quantity of money or currency; an amount indefinitely.

"Lesse than a thousand pound he would not have.

Ne gladly for that summe he wold not gon."

Chaucer: C. T., 11,535.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion. -sion = şhñ; tion, -şion = zhñ. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhş. -ble, -dle, &c. = beş, deş.

5. Height, completion; highest point.

"The sum of earthly bliss, Which I enjoy." Milton: P. L., viii. 522.

6. An arithmetical problem to be solved; an example of an arithmetical rule to be worked out; such a problem worked out, and the various steps shown.

*¶ In sum: In short, in brief; briefly, shortly.

"In sum, no man can have a greater veneration for Chaucer than myself."—Dryden. (Todd.)

sūm, *summe, v. t. [French sommer, from Latin summo, from summa=a sum (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To add into one sum or amount; to collect as items or particulars into a total; to add together and find the sum or total amount of; to cast up.

"The high priest . . . may sum the silver brought in."—2 Kings xxii. 4.

*2. To supply with full clothing. [II.]

II. Falconry: To have (as the feathers) full grown and in full number.

"With prosperous wing full summ'd." Milton: P. L., i. 14.

¶ To sum up:

(1) To bring or collect into a narrow or small compass; to comprise in a few words; to condense.

"The summing up of the whole work of redemption."—Gilpin: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 42.

(2) To recapitulate to the jury clearly and concisely the different facts and circumstances which have been brought out in evidence, giving an exposition of the law where it appears necessary. (Said of the presiding judge at a trial, and sometimes of a counsel summing up the evidence on his own side on the conclusion of his case.)

sū-măc, sū-măch, s. [Fr. sumac; Sp. zumaque; Port. summagre, from Arab. sommak.]

1. Bot.: The genus Rhus (q. v.).

2. Dyeing, Tanning, &c.: A tan obtained from the dried and chipped leaves and shoots of Rhus coriaria. Sumach is used in the preparation of morocco leather. With mordants it dyes the same color as galls. In calico-printing, sumach affords, with a mordant of tin, a yellow color; with acetate of iron gray or black, according as the mordant is weak or strong; and with sulphate of zinc a brownish-yellow.

sūm'-age, sūm'-mage (age as ĭg), s. [Fr. sommier=a pack-horse.] A toll for carriage on horseback; a horse-load. (Cowel.)

Sū-mă-tran, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Sumatra or its inhabitants.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Sumatra.

Sumatran-broadbill, s.

Ornith.: Corydon sumatranus, from Borneo and Sumatra. Little is known of its habits, except that it frequents moist and shady places and associates in small groups.

Sumatran-monkey, s.

Zool.: Semnopithecus melalophos, from the forests of Sumatra. Male brilliant yellow-red above, face blue, a tuft of black hairs on the face in the shape of a bandeau.

Sumatran-rhinoceros, s.

Zoölogy: Rhinoceros (Ceratorhinus) sumatrensis. It is the better known of the two-horned Asiatic species. There are two obtusely-pointed horns, the body is covered with bristles, and the folds of the skin are deep [RHINOCEROS 1 (1) (b).]

sūm'-būl, s. [Maharatta sumbol=Nardostachys jatamansi.] (See etym. and compounds.)

Botany:

1. Euryangium (formerly Ferula) sumbul, is a native of Bokhara. The root is imported in transverse sections, two and a half to five inches in diameter, and three-fourths of an inch to one and a half inches thick. The epidermis, which is wrinkled, is of a light brown color, the inner portions porous, and the body of the fibers loosely packed together; the odor is strong and musk-like. [MUSK-ROOT.]

2. Nardostachys jatamansi. [SPIKENARD, 1.]

sumbul-oil, s.

Chem.: A mixture of volatile oils, obtained by the distillation of sumbul-balsam.

sumbul-root, s. [SUMBUL, 1.]

sūm-bū'-līc, a. [Eng. sumbul; -ic.] Contained in or derived from sumbul (q. v.).

sumbulic-acid, s.

Chem.: The name given by Reinsch to an acid contained in sumbul-root; now regarded as identical with angelic-acid.

sūm'-bū-līne, s. [Eng. sumbul; -ine.]

Chem.: The name given by Murawieff to an alkaloid supposed to exist in sumbul-root.

sūm'-lēss, a. [Eng. sum; -less.] Not capable of being summed up or counted; innumerable, incalculable, inestimable, countless.

"Welcom'd with gifts of price, a sumless store!" Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xix. 312.

sūm-mār'-ī-lŷ, adv. [Eng. summary; -ly.]

1. In a summary manner; in a few words or a narrow compass; briefly, concisely, shortly, succinctly.

"And this present sentence . . . comprehendeth summarily as well the fearful estate of iniquitie over-exalted, as the hope layd up for righteousness oppress."—Hooker: Nature of Pride.

2. In a short way or method; without delay.

"When the parties proceed summarily, and they chuse the ordinary way of proceeding, the cause is made plenary."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

sūm'-mā-rīst, s. [Eng. summar(y); -ist.] One who writes or compiles a summary; a summarist (q. v.).

sūm'-mā-rīze, sūm'-mā-rīse, v. t. [Eng. summar(y); -ize.] To make a summary or abstract of; to represent briefly or concisely; to epitomize.

"If we endeavor to summarize the conclusions."—Phillips: Geology, ii. 526.

sūm'-mā-rŷ, a. & s. [Fr. sommaire (a. & s.), from Lat. summarius=a summary, an epitome; Sp. sumario; Port. summario; Ital. sommario.]

A. As adjective:

1. Reduced into a narrow compass, or into few words; brief, concise, succinct, short, compendious.

"I shall take leave of this island, with a summary account of their force and direction."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. vi., ch. viii.

2. Done in a short way or method; rapidly performed.

3. Applied to proceedings in law carried on by methods intended to facilitate and promote the transaction of business; short, rapid; as, a summary conviction is one before a magistrate without the intervention of a jury.

"For the general safety, therefore, a summary jurisdiction of terrible extent must, in camps, be entrusted to rude tribunals composed of men of the sword."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: A short, abridged, or condensed statement or account; an epitome, an abstract; an abridgement or compendium containing the sum or substance of a fuller statement.

"Closing this chapter, as I promised, with a table representing a summary, or short sketch of what hath been done in it."—Waterland: Works, iv. 203.

2. Law: A short application to a court or judge, without the formality of a full proceeding.

sūm-mā'-tion, s. [Fr. sommation, from Lat. summatus, pa. par. of summo=to sum up.]

1. The act or process of forming a sum or total amount.

2. An aggregate.

¶ Summation of a series: [SERIES].

sūm'-mēr (1), *som-er, *som-mer, *sum-er, s. & a. [A. S. sumor, sumer; cogn. with Dut. zomer; Icel. sumar; Dan. sommer; Sw. sommar; O. H. Ger. sumar; Ger. sommer; cf. Sansc. samā=a year.]

A. As substantive:

1. That season of the year when the sun shines most directly upon any region; the warmest season of the year. North of the equator, it is commonly taken to include the months of June, July, and August; though some substitute May, June, and July. The former view conforms better to fact. July, which by this arrangement is midsummer month, is the hottest in the year, for although the maximum of heat is obtained on June 21, the longest day, the amount received for many subsequent days is greater than that lost by radiation, and the temperature continues to increase. Summer is the appropriate season for the hay harvest and for the ripening of the earlier fruits. Astronomically considered, summer begins, in the northern hemisphere, when the sun enters the sign of Cancer, about June 21, and continues till Sept. 23, during which time he passes through Cancer, Leo, and Virgo. In the southern hemisphere the opposite is the case, it being winter there when it is summer here, and vice versa. During the astronomical summer of the southern hemisphere the sun passes through Capricorn, Aquarius, and Pisces.

"Still as night,
Or summer's noon-tide air." Milton: P. L., ii. 309.

2. Used to express a whole year; a twelve-month.

"Five summers have I spent in further Greece." Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, i. 1.

B. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to summer; used in summer.

"He was sitting in a summer parlor."—Judges iii. 20.

¶ (1) Indian summer: [INDIAN.]

(2) St. Luke's summer: Fine weather often occurring about St. Luke's day, Oct. 18.

(3) St. Martin's summer: A period of fine weather occurring in some climates after winter has set in, about St. Martin's day, Nov. 11; hence, figuratively, prosperity after misfortune.

"Expect St. Martin's Summer, halcyon days." Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., i. 2.

¶ Summer is largely used in combination with other words, the meanings in most cases being obvious.

summer-bird, s. A cuckold; the reference is to the cuckoo, which is a spring and summer visitor.

"Some other knave Shall dub her husband a summer-bird." Scholehouse of Women (1560).

summer-catarrh, s.

Pathol.: Hay-asthma (q. v.).

summer-cholera, s.

Pathol.: British cholera. [CHOLERA, A. 1.]

summer-complaint, s.

Pathol.: A popular name in the United States for diarrhœa occurring in the summer. By some authorities the term is used to include dysentery and cholera infantum, while others confine it to the latter complaint.

summer-cypress, s.

Botany: Kochia scoparia, a chenopod, a native of Greece, introduced into Britain in 1629.

summer-dried, adj. Dried up by the heat of summer.

"Like a summer-dried fountain." Scott: Lady of the Lake, iii. 16.

summer-duck, s.

Ornith.: Aix († Dendro-nessa) sponsa. The drake is about eighteen inches long, and has very beautiful and brilliantly-colored metallic plumage. The Summer-duck is a native of North America, and in the breeding season is distributed over the United States, migrating southward in winter. It is capable of domestication. Called also Wood-duck, from its habit of nesting in holes in trees.

Summer-duck.

summer-eggs, s. pl. [SUMMER-OVA.]

summer-fallow, s. & a.

A. As subst.: Naked fallow: land lying bare of crops in summer, but frequently plowed, harrowed, and rolled, so as to pulverize it and clear it of weeds.

B. As adj.: Lying fallow during the summer.

summer-fallow, verb t. To plow and allow to lie fallow; to plow and work repeatedly in summer, to prepare for wheat or other crop.

summer-fever, s.

Pathol.: A name proposed by Dr. Pirrie for hay-fever (q. v.).

summer-house, s.

1. A house, building, or shed in a garden, for use in summer.

2. A house for summer residence.

summer-life, s. A life of pleasure and ease.

summer-ova, summer-eggs, s. pl.

Biol.: (See extract.)

"In some Rotifers the eggs are distinguishable, as in certain Turbellaria, into summer and winter ova. The latter are inclosed in a peculiar shell. In Lacinularia it appeared to me that the winter ova were segregated portions of the ovarium, and that they were probably developed without impregnation. Cohn, on the contrary, has given reasons for believing that the summer-ova are occasionally, if not always, developed without being fecundated, and that it is the winter ova which are fecundated."—Huxley: Anat. Invert. Anim., p. 190.

summer red-bird, s.

Ornith.: Pyranga æstiva.

summer-ring, s. A light ring worn by Roman fops in the summer. A translation of the aurum æstivum of Juvenal (i. 28; cf. Mart. xiv. 123).

summer-ripe, a. Quite ripe.

"Corn, when it is summer-ripe."—Hacket: Life of Williams, ii. 228.

summer-room, s. A summer-house (q. v.).

"His lordship is building a summer-room."—De Foe: Tour Through Great Britain, i. 335.

*summer-seat, s. A villa, a country-house.

*summer-seeming, a. Appearing like summer; hence, full-blown, rank, luxuriant. (Shakesp.: Macbeth, iv. 3.)

*summer-shine, s. The summer dress of a bird or insect.

summer-snipe, s.

Ornith.: Totanus hypoleucus, the Common Sand-piper (q. v.). [TOTANUS.]

summer-snowflake, s.

Bot.: Leucocum aestivum, an amaryllid, with long, linear, keeled leaves, a two-edged scape, a many-flowered spathe with white drooping flowers.

summer-stir, v. t. To summer-fallow (q. v.).

*summer-swelling, a. Growing up in summer. (Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, ii. 4.)

†summer-tide, *somer-tide, *somerestide, s. Summer; the season of summer.

"Lull'd by this fountain in the summer-tide."

Wordsworth: Hart-Leap Well, ii.

summer-time, s. The time or season of summer.

"'Twas in the prime of summer-time,"

Hood: Eugene Aram.

summer-wheat, s. Wheat sown in spring as opposed to winter wheat, or wheat sown in autumn. Called also, and more properly, Spring wheat.

summer yellow-bird, s.

Ornith.: Dendroica aestiva. [YELLOW-WARBLER.]

sũm'-mêr (2), s. [O. Fr. somier, sommir, sumer=a pack-horse, from somme, some, saume, sume=a burden.] [SUMPTER.]

1. Carpentry:

(1) A horizontal beam or girder; a summer-tree.

(2) The lintel of a doorway.

(3) A floor timber receiving the ends of the joists, and supporting the floor or the ceiling, as the case may be.

(4) A breast-summer (q. v.).

"Oak, and the like true-hearted timber, may be better trusted in cross and transverse works for summers or girders, or binding-beams."—Wotton: Remains, p. 11.

2. Mason.: A lintel (q. v.).

summer-stone, s. [SKEW, s., II.]

summer-tree, s.

Carp.: A horizontal beam brought even with the face (breast) of a wall, to support a wall above a gap or opening, as a shop-front, for instance.

sũm'-mêr (3), s. [Eng. sum, v.; -er.] One who sums; one who casts up accounts.

sũm'-mêr, v. i. & t. [SUMMER (1), s.]

*A. Intrans.: To pass or spend the summer.

"The fowls shall summer upon them, and all the beasts shall winter upon them."—Isaiah xviii. 6.

B. Transitive:

1. To feed or keep during the summer.

"He never summers his hunters in boxes."—Field, Feb. 26, 1887.

*2. To keep or carry through the summer; to keep warm.

"Maidens well summered, and warm kept, are like flies at Bartholomew-tide, blind."—Shakesp.: Henry V., v. 2.

sũm'-mêr-îng (1), s. [Eng. summer (1), s.; -îng.]

1. A kind of early apple.

*2. Rural merrymaking at midsommer; a summer-holiday.

sũm'-mêr-îng (2), *sôm'-mêr-îng, s. [Eng. summer (2), s.; -îng.]

Arch.: In cylindrical vaulting, the two surfaces intersecting the intrados of a vault in lines parallel to the axis of the cylinder. In conic vaulting, Summering.

where the axis is horizontal, the two surfaces which, if produced, would intersect the axis of the cone. The illustration shows part of the crypt of Canterbury Cathedral, England, built 1109-30, under the choir of Prior Conrad.

sũm'-mêr-like, adj. [Eng. summer (1), s., and like.] Resembling summer; warm like summer.

"The day was summerlike."—Field, April 4, 1885.

*sũm'-mêr-lî-nêss, *sum-mer-li-ness, s. [As if from an adj. summerly; suff. -ness.] The state of having a mild or summerlike temperature.

"Some will have it [Somersetshire] so called from the summerliness, or temperate pleasantness thereof."—Fuller: Worthies; Somersetshire.

*sũm'-mêr-lỹ, a. [Eng. summer (1); -ly.] Of or belonging to summer.

"As summerly as June and Strawberry Hill may sound."—Walpole: Letters, ii. 305.

sũm'-mêr-sêt, sũm'-mêr-sault, s. [See def.] The same as SOMERSAULT (q. v.).

"Some do the summersault,
And o'er the bar like tumblers vault."

Butler: Hudibras.

†sũm'-mêr-ỹ, a. [Eng. summer (1), s.; -y.] Of or pertaining to summer; summerlike.

sũm'-mîng, pr. par., a. & s. [SUM, v.]

summing-up, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A condensed account; a summary.

"In his summing-up and in his estimate of the comparative worth of his subject."—St. James's Gazette, June 28, 1887.

2. Law: A judge's charge to a jury.

sũm'-mîst, s. [Eccles. Lat. summista.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who forms an abridgment or summary; a summarist.

"All the summists and the summaries of all vices."—Bp. Bull: Corruptions of the Church of Rome.

2. Church Hist.: A name given to the scholastic divines of the Middle Ages, who propounded their dogmas in works called Summæ Theologiæ. This name was first adopted from the Summa Universæ Theologiæ of Alexander Hales (died 1245), whose renown was eclipsed by that of Albertus Magnus (died 1280), in his turn surpassed by his disciple, St. Thomas Aquinas (1224-74), who published his celebrated work on divinity under the title of Summæ Totius Theologiæ.

sũm'-mîst, s. [Fr. sommet, dimin. of O. Fr. som=the top (of a hill), from Lat. summum=the highest point; prop. neut. sing. of summus=highest.] [SUM, s.]

1. The highest point; the top.

"Fixed on the summit of the highest mount."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 3.

2. The highest point or degree; utmost elevation; the acme.

"The very summit of all Christian excellence."—Knox: Sermons, vol. vi., ser. 18.

summit-level, s. The highest level; the highest of a series of elevations over which a canal, water-course, railway, &c., is carried.

"Nor does the drainage from the summit-level always fall, as I remarked near the weatherboard."—Darwin: Voyage round the World, ch. xix.

*sũm'-mîst-lêss, a. [Eng. summit; -less.] Having no summit.

*sũm'-mîst-ỹ, s. [Lat. summitas, from summus=highest.] [SUM.]

1. The height or top of anything; the highest point.

2. The highest point or degree; summit, perfection.

"The head, top, and summity of it."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 858.

*sũm'-môn, subst. [SUMMONS.] A summons. (A pseudo-singular.)

"Esther durst not come into the presence till the sceptor had given her permission; a summons of that emboldens her."—Adams: Works, iii. 250.

sũm'-môn, *som-ni-en, *som-one, *som-on-y, *som-ne, *sompne, *sum-ny, v. t. [O. Fr. somoner, semoner, semonde, sumoner; Fr. semonde, from Lat. summoneo=to remind privily: sum (for sub)=under, and moneo=to advise.]

*1. To attend, to meet. (In this sense, from A. S. samnian, sonnian=to collect, from sam, saman=together.)

"Hys poer he let sumny."

Robert of Gloucester, p. 182.

2. To call, cite, or notify by authority to meet or attend at a place specified; to cite to attend in person to some public duty, especially to cite to appear in court.

"No royal writ had summoned the Convention which recalled Charles the Second."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

3. To call; to send for; to ask the attendance of.

*4. To call on; to warn; especially to call on to surrender. (Shakesp.: Coriolanus, i. 4.)

5. To call up; to call into action or exertion; to rouse, to raise. (Followed by up)

"Summon up your dearest spirits."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, ii. 1.

† For the difference between to summon and to cite, see CITE.

sũm'-môn-êr, *somp-nour, *som-on-our, subst. [Fr. semonneur, from semonde=to summon (q. v.).] One who summons or cites by authority; especially, one who cites to appear in court; formerly, specif., an apparitor (q. v.).

"Close pent-up guilts,
Rive your concealing continents, and cry
These dreadful summoners grace."

Shakesp.: Lear, iii. 2.

sũm'-môn-îng, pr. par., a. & s. [SUMMON.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of citing or calling; a summons.

"Reluctantly and slow the maid
The unwelcome summoning obeyed."

Scott: Lady of the Lake, ii. 21.

sũm'-mônş, *som-ons, *sum-ouns, s. [French semonce=a warning, a citation, a summons, prop. fem. of semons, pa. par. of semonde=to summon (q. v.).] Summons is, therefore, really a singular noun, though apparently plural.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of summoning; an official citation; a call by authority or the command of a superior to appear at a place named, or to attend to some public duty.

"I have, quod he, of somons here a bill."

2. An invitation, call, or asking to go to or appear at some place; a call to assemble or meet together.

"O'er dale and hill the summons flew."

Scott: Lady of the Lake, iii. 19.

3. A call or appeal with more or less earnestness or insistence.

"A loud summons shook the gate."

Scott: Rokeby, iv. 7.

II. Technically:

1. Law: A call by authority to appear in a court; also the written or printed document by which such call is given.

(a) A writ calling on a defendant to cause an appearance to an action to be entered for him within a certain time after service, in default of which the plaintiff may proceed to judgment and execution.

(b) An application to a judge at chambers, whether at law or in equity.

(c) A citation summoning a person to appear before a police magistrate or bench of justices.

2. Mil.: A call to surrender.

sũm'-mônş, v. t. [SUMMONS, s.] To serve with a summons, to summon. (Vulgar.)

sũm'-mũm bõ'-nũm, phr. [Lat.=the chief or ultimate good.]

Ethics: A phrase employed by ancient philosophers to denote that end in the following and attainment of which the progress, perfection, and happiness of human beings consist. Cicero treated of the subject very fully in his de Finibus.

*sum-ner, s. [SUMMONER.]

sũ-moôm', s. [SIMOOM.]

sũmp, s. [Sw. & Dan. sump; Dut. somp; Ger. sumpf=a marsh, a swamp, a pool.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A puddle; a pool of dirty water. (Prov.)

2. A pond of water for salt-works.

II. Technically:

1. Metal.: A pit of stone at a furnace to collect the metal at its first fusion.

One evening sumptuously lodged."

Wordsworth: Excursion, ii.

sūmp'-tū-ōūs-nēss, s. [Eng. sumptuous; -ness.] The quality or state of being sumptuous; expensiveness, costliness, magnificence, splendor.

"I will not fall out with those that can reconcile sumptuousness and charity."—Boyle.

sūmp'-ture, subst. [Latin sumptus=expense.] Sumptuousness, magnificence.

"Her traine of servants, and collateral Sumpture of houses."

Chapman: Homer's Hymn to Hermes.

sūn (1), *sonne, *sunne, s. [A. S. sunne (fem.); cogn. with Dut. zon (fem.); Icel. sunna (fem.); Ger. sonne (fem.); O. H. German sunna; Goth. sunna (masc.), sunno (fem.); Icel. sól; Lat. sol=the sun; Sansc. sūna=sun, son.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 1.

(2) A luminary or orb which constitutes the center of any system of worlds; as, The fixed stars are *sun*s in their respective systems.

(3) Popularly applied to the sunshine, or a place where the sun shines; a sunny place; as, to stand or sit in the sun.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Anything splendid or luminous; that which is the chief source of light, honor, prosperity, or the like.

"The sun of Rome is set."

Shakesp.: Julius Caesar, v. 3.

(2) A revolution of the earth round the sun; a year.

II. Technically:

1. Astronomy: The great central luminary which gives light and heat to our earth and the other planets of the solar system. In common language, the planets are said to revolve around the sun as a center; more precisely, they move in elliptic orbits, the sun occupying nearly one focus of each ellipse, around the common center of gravity of the solar system, which falls within the body of the sun, but not always at its center. The mean distance of the sun from the earth was long alleged to be 95,000,000 miles, but there was error in the data on which the calculation was founded; now the distance is held to be either about 92,700,000 miles (Ball, in 1885), or 92,965,000 miles (Norman Lockyer, in 1886). Till lately it was thought that the portion of the sun visible to the naked eye constituted the whole luminary; now it is believed that around that central sphere or spheroid, technically called the photosphere, there are three, if not four, concentric envelopes—the chromosphere, the inner corona, the upper atmosphere, and, perhaps, an outer corona. The axis of the sun is inclined about 7° to the elliptic. The passage of spots across the sun's disk proves that it rotates on that axis from west to east in 25 days 5 hours. From June 3 to Dec. 5 the north pole, and for the next six months the south pole, of the sun is gradually moving earthward.

The axis of the photosphere is 866,500 miles in length; its bulk is more than a million times that of the earth, but its density is only about a quarter that of the earth. With a specific gravity so low, the photosphere cannot be solid. It may, perhaps, be liquid at the center, but the outer parts must be gaseous. It has not yet been found possible to produce artificially on the earth a heat so intense as that of the photosphere. The coolest part of its atmosphere must be outside, and the hypothesis that the sun might be an inhabited world, with a heated and luminous atmosphere, has been abandoned. Under the telescope, the surface of the photosphere seems covered with a network of polygonal and other figures. Among them are pores and domes—the former, which are dark markings, are the seat of downrushes of vapor; the latter, or brighter portions, probably consist of luminous clouds. Sometimes the domes are heaped together and arranged in different directions, constituting what are called faculae. These are often thousands of miles long, and may last for days, or even weeks. Spots also often appear upon the sun's disk. Faculae follow and do not precede spots. The chromosphere is a concentric envelope immediately external to the photosphere. It is of a magnificent scarlet color, and from 3,600 to 5,300 miles thick. Some parts are billowy and others spike-like in appearance. It is a sea of hydrogen with some unknown element. Sometimes other vapors surge up in it, producing injections which again tend to develop into prominences. The latter are of two kinds, violent and quiet prominences. Some of the former are 40,000 miles high; they resemble trees or "fog-spouts," appearances like waterspouts, but occurring in fog. The most violent prominences are sometimes called metallic prominences, and mount up at the rate of 335 miles a second. The sun spots, the faculae, and the metallic prominences are at a maximum at the same time. [SUN-SPOT.]

Immediately surrounding the chromosphere is the inner corona. Its outer part is about 100,000 miles from the surface of the photosphere. Like the chromosphere, it is seen only in eclipses. It is constituted by certain red flames, prominences, or protuberances, which pass through the chromosphere from the photosphere. The inner corona is composed mainly of hydrogen.

The next envelope is the outer atmosphere, from half a million to a million of miles high, with its outer margin constituting an irregular outline full of strange and varying forms.

The external envelope, the nature of which is yet uncertain, is the outer corona.

M. Camille Flammarion tells us that the sun weighs 324,000 times as much as our globe and is 1,283,000 times the size of it. To form an idea of the superiority of the size of the sun over the earth we can represent the sun by a sphere of 22 meters in diameter—larger than the dome of the Pantheon of Paris—and place beside it to represent the earth a toy baloon of 20 centimeters in diameter.

The real dimensions of the sun are concluded from its apparent dimensions combined with its distance. Six different methods of measurement prove that if the entire earth were transported to the same distance as the sun, it would be seen at an angle of 17.64°—that is to say, at a distance equal to 11,693 times the diameter of our globe, or in other words, 149,000,000 of kilometers. The only way of appreciating such a distance is to measure it by the time a train would take to traverse it. Suppose, for instance, an express train going at sixty kilometers an hour set out to reach the sun, the duration of the journey would be 283 years. But an express train travels at a relatively slow rate of speed. Sensation, which is rapid, almost instantaneous, travels at the rate of twenty-eight meters per second. If a child asked for the sun, as children sometimes do for the moon, and his nurse gave it to him, and he had arms long enough to reach the sun so that it burnt his fingers he would never feel this burn. The child would become an old man and die long before the sensation of burning could pass from the tips of his fingers to his brain, for the time requisite for the transmission of this sensation would not be less than 163 years.

Kirchhoff considered that the following elements were present in the sun: Sodium, iron, calcium, magnesium, nickel, barium, copper, and zinc. Angström and Thalén found sodium, iron, calcium, magnesium, and nickel, but failed to detect the rest. In their place they met with chromium, cobalt, hydrogen, manganese, and titanium. The intense heat not only vaporizes them, but drives them into forms spectroscopically different from any known to exist in the earth.

The sun's heat raises vapor from the earth, ultimately producing rain, supplying a necessary element for the growth of plants and the sustenance of animals. Stored up in coal it supplies us with fuel and gives us steam as a creator of energy, while the sun's light similarly stored furnishes the gas which illumines houses and cities.

Though the sun may obtain as fuel a few meteors, it would expire if it had nothing else to burn. But the enormous radiation from its disc into space is partly, if not entirely, counteracted by fresh heat generated by the contraction of its volume. Hence, on the hypothesis now generally accepted, the sun was at one time an enormous mass of incandescent vapor, which, becoming more condensed as ages roll on [NEBULAR-HYPOTHESIS], is slowly diminishing in size, and will at length cease to give forth light and heat. Some authorities think this will not come to pass for ten millions of years, but Sir William Thomson considers "that it would be rash to reckon on more than five to six million years of sunlight for the future." [FLASH SPECTRUM.]

2. Pyrotechny: A kind of firework. A strong paper case is filled with a composition which does not burn so fast as rocket-composition, driven solid. Numbers of these are attached, at short intervals, to wooden frames, usually circular. The suns emit a steady and brilliant stream of light, and are called stationary or revolving according to the nature of the frame on which they are fixed.

¶ (1) To have the sun in one's eyes: To be intoxicated.

"He furthermore took occasion to apologize for any negligence that might be perceptible in his dress, on the ground that last night he had had 'the sun very strong in his eyes;' by which expression he was understood to convey to his hearers, in the most delicate manner possible, the information that he had been extremely drunk."—Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop, ch. ii.

(2) Under the sun: In the world; on earth.

"There is no new thing under the sun."—Eccles. i. 4.

¶ Sun is very largely used in composition, the meanings of the compounds being in most instances sufficiently obvious; as, sun-lit, sun-scorched, &c.

sun-and-planet wheels, s. pl. An ingenious contrivance invented by Watt as a substitute for the crank in converting the reciprocating motion of the beam into a rotatory motion. The central gear (a) is called the sun-gear, and the outer one (b) the planet-gear. In the form shown in the illustration, the revolution of the planet-wheel rotates the sun-wheel, together with its shaft and the fly-wheel. For this purpose the planet-wheel (b) is fast to the pitman (c), and its axis is caused to revolve around the wheel without the rotation of the planet-wheel on its own axis. [PLANET-WHEEL.]

Sun-and-planet Wheels.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

sun-animalcule, s.Zoöl.: Actinophrys sol. [ACTINOPHREYS.]

"It consists of a small bit of globular protoplasm, with spines radiating in every direction from its surface; and when seen in perfect condition for the first time under the microscope with proper illumination it seems to shine like 'the sun in its brightness.' Hence the original observers gave it the name of the Sun-animalcule. Indeed, any old ordinary picture of the sun would do very well for Actinophrys, as conveying a general idea of its form."—John Badcock: Vignettes from Invisible Life, p. 104.

sun-bear, s.Zoöl.: A popular name for two Bears:

1. Ursus tibetanus, from Nepaul, Assam, Eastern Siberia, and China. It is about five feet long, of slender make, with close black fur. The chin is white, and there is a broad Y-shaped mark on the chest.

2. [MALAYAN-BEAR.]

sun-beat, *sun-beaten, adj. Shone on fiercely by the sun.

"And wearies fruitful Nilus to convey His sun-beat waters by so long a way."

Dryden: Juvenal, x. 237.sun-beetle, s.*Entom.: (See extract.)

"The metallic species of Amara and Poecilus are termed Sun-beetles, from their habit of running about foot-paths during hot, sunshiny weather."—Westwood: Class. of Insects, i. 85.

sun-bird, s.

1. Anthrop.: An unidentified bird, mentioned by Rochefort (Iles Antilles, bk. ii., ch. viii.)

"When at midday the sunlight poured down upon the altar through the hole or shaft pierced for this purpose in the rocky vault of the cave, through which the sun-birds, the Tonatzuli, were let fly up sunward as messengers."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 289.

2. Ornith.: A popular name for any of the Nectariniidæ (q. v.), divided by Capt. G. E. Shelley (Monograph of the Sun-birds), into two sub-families, Nectariniæ and Promeropiæ, the former containing the Sun-birds proper, and the latter the Long-tailed Sun-birds. They are found over the whole of Africa, ranging through Palestine to India, thence through the Indian and Malayan Islands to Northern Australia, where a single species inhabits Cape York peninsula and Northern Queensland. They are small birds, in nearly every case of brilliant and metallic plumage, with a striking external resemblance to Humming-birds, with which they are not infrequently confounded, but differing from them in the structure of the feet and tongue, the shape of the sternum, and other important characteristics. They feed chiefly on insects, small berries, and fruit, and sip the juices of flowers, and from this habit the name of the type-genus (Nectarinia) is derived. The majority of the Sun-birds build nests of an oval form, suspended from the branch of a tree at a considerable height from the ground, so as to be out of the reach of serpents and lizards.

Ornith.: Eurypyga helias, from the northern parts of South America. It is about sixteen inches long; body small and thin, neck long and slender, head like that of a heron, with a long, powerful beak compressed at the sides and slightly arched at the culmen; the plumage is minutely variegated with bars and spots of many colors. It is often made a pet by the Brazilians, who call it Pavao (=Peacock), whence it is sometimes called the Peacock Heron.

sun-blink, s. A flash or glimpse of sunshine. (Scotch.) sun-bonnet, s. A lady's bonnet having a shade as a protection against the sun.

sun-bow, s. An iris formed by the refraction of light on the spray of cataracts or of any rising vapor.

"The circling sun-bows did appear Its fall down the hoar precipice of spray."
Shelley: Witch of Atlas, xlii.

sun-bright, a. Bright as the sun; resembling the sun in brightness; bright with the sun; sunny.

"Upon the landscape of the sun-bright vale, Seen, from the shady room in which we sate."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. viii.

sun-burn, v. t. To discolor or scorch by the sun; to tan, to freckle.

sun-burn, sun-burning, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: The discoloration produced on the skin by the rays of the sun.

"The heat of the sun may darken the color of the skin which we call sun-burning."—Boyle.

2. Veg. Pathol.: [HELIOSIS.]

sun-burner, s. A large reflecting cluster of burners placed beneath an opening in the ceiling, for lighting and ventilating a public building.

sun-chief, s.

Anthrop.: In solar hierarchies a chief or ruler who was at the same time priest of the Sun or the Sun-god, with whom he claimed relationship.

"Every morning the great Sun-chief stood at the house-door facing the east, shouted and prostrated himself thrice, and smoked first towards the sun, and then towards the other three quarters."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 288.

sun-clad, a. Clothed in sunshine or radiance.

"And woods were brightened, and soft gales Went forth to kiss the sun-clad vales."

Longfellow: Sunrise on the Hills.sun-crack, s.

Geol. (pl.): Cracks left upon rocks at the time when they were being consolidated.

"The sun-cracks . . . divide the surface into areolæ of various sizes and shapes, and when, as is most common, the superficial layer of mud is darker than the stone, show themselves well in relief by exposing the lower stratum."—Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xii. 202.

sun-dazzling, a. Shining like the sun; bright, brilliant.

"Your eyes sun-dazzling coruscancy will exile all the cloudie vapour of heart-tormenting melancholy."—J. Taylor: Workes (1630), p. 111.

sun-dew, s. [For reason of name, see extract. Prior and Britten & Holland derive it from A. S. and Fris. sin=ever, and Eug. dew.]

Botany:

1. The genus Drosera (q. v.), of which about 100 species are known; often applied specif. to D. rotundifolia, the Common Sun-dew, a very remarkable insectivorous plant. Darwin's experiments seem to show that the insects captured and absorbed by the species supply them with the nitrogenous matter that the soil in which they grow is too poor to furnish. He thus summarizes (Insect. Plants, p. 18) the manner in which these plants are nourished: "A plant of Drosera, with the edges of its leaves curled inward, so as to form a temporary stomach, with the glands of the closely inflected tentacles pouring forth their acid secretion, which dissolves a small matter afterward to be absorbed, may be said to feed like an animal. But, differently from an animal, it drinks by means of its roots; and it must drink largely, so as to retain many drops of viscid fluid round the glands, sometimes as many as 260, exposed during the whole day to a glaring sun."

"The tentacles on one side are inflected over a bit of meat placed on the disc, the glands are each surrounded by large drops of extremely viscid secretion, which, glittering in the sun, have given rise to the plant's poetical name of sun-dew."—Darwin: Insectivorous Plants, p. 4.

2. (Pl.): The Droseraceæ (q. v.). (Lindley.)sun-dial, s. [DIAL.]sun-dog, s.

Meteor.: A luminous spot sometimes visible a few degrees from the sun. It is believed to be formed by the intersection of two or more halos.

sun-dried, a. Dried in the sun.sun-drops, s. pl.*Bot.: Oenothera fruticosa and O. riparia.sun-fern, s.*Bot.: Polypodium phlegopteris.sun-festival, s.

Compar. Relig.: A festival in honor of the Sun, or of the Sun-god (q. v.).

"The ancient rites of solar worship are represented in modern Christendom . . . in the continuance of the great sun-festivals countenanced by or incorporated in Christianity."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 296, 297.

sun-fever, s.

Pathology: A fever produced by the heat of the tropical sun. It is a severe form of the common continued fevers of temperate climates.

sun-fish, s.Ichthyology:

1. Lampris luna, called also Opah, and Kingfish (q. v.).

2. Any individual of the genera Centrarchus, Bryttus, and Pomotis, from the fresh waters of this country. They are small fishes, about six inches long, and are not used for food.

3. Any individual of the genus Orthogoriscus (q. v.). The Common or Broad Sun-fish (Orthogoriscus mola), though a native of warmer seas, is often taken in the summer months round the coasts of northern Europe, and is usually captured when floating on the surface, as if basking in the sun. When laid hold of they are said to utter sounds like the grunting of a hog. The stomach has been known to contain corallines, barnacles, and sea-weed, though usually nothing but mucus is found in it. Couch mentions that the flesh is good eating, and resembles crab in flavor, but it is never sent to market. The largest specimen on record measured about eight feet long, and rather more in depth from the dorsal to the ventral fins. The Oblong Sun-fish, called also Oblong Tetradon and Truncated Sun-fish, has the height of body less than one-half its total length. A specimen taken at Plymouth, England, in 1734, weighed 500 lbs., but it is not often met with of so large a size. It feeds on worms, crabs, and other marine animals, and does not float on the surface like the Common Sun-fish.

Sun-fish.

"The name sun-fish is variously regarded as derived from the form of the fish, and from its habit of floating at the surface of the water, in fine weather, as if to enjoy the sunshine."—Chambers' Encyc., ix. 213.

sun-gem, s.

Ornith.: A popular name for any individual of the genus Heliactin. They are among the most elegant of the Humming-birds, and have a brilliant metallic double crest and long graduated tail. There is but one species, Heliactin cornuta, from Brazil.

sun-glimpse, subst. A glimpse of the sun; a momentary burst of sunshine.

"When lovers meet in adverse hour,
'Tis like a sun-glimpse through a shower."
Scott: Rokeby, iv. 17.

sun-god, s.Comparative Religion:

1. The sun considered as one of the great deities, as representative of the greatest deity, or as the greatest deity.

2. An embodiment, in whole or in part, of solar characteristics regarded as a deity; e. g., the Assyrian Bel, the Tyrian Baal, the Persian Mithras, the Egyptian Ra, and the Greek Phœbus.

"The modern student who shall undertake to discriminate among the sun-gods of European lands to separate the solar and non-solar elements of the Greek Apollo and Herakles, or the Slavonic Perun and Swatowit, has a task before him complicate with that all but hopeless difficulty which besets the study of myth the moment that the clue of direct comparison with nature falls away."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 294.

sun-light, s.

1. [SUNLIGHT.]

2. The same as SUN-BURNER (q. v.).

sun-myth, s.Anthrop.: A solar myth (q. v.).

"The author would now rather say more cautiously not that Quetzalcohuatl is the Sun personified, but that his story contains episodes seemingly drawn from sun-myth."—Tylor: Early Hist. Mankind (ed. 1878), p. 153. (Note.)

Sun of Righteousness, s.

Script.: Christ, as the source of light, energy, and comfort to his disciples. (Mal. iv. 2.)

sun-opal, s. The same as FIRE-OPAL (q. v.).sun-pain, s. [HEMICRANIA.]

sun-pan, s. A pan or tank in which clay was formerly left to lie until fit to use in making pottery.

sun-picture, s. A name applicable to all kinds of pictures produced by the action of light upon sensitized surfaces; a photograph, or heliograph.

sun-plane, s.

Cooper.: A tool like a jack-plane, but of a circular plan, used for leveling down the ends of the staves of a cask or barrel.

sun-rites, s. pl.

Compar. Relig.: Rites in honor of the sun or of the sun-god (q. v.).

"As for modern memory of the sun-rites of mid-winter, Europe recognizes Christmas as a primitive solar festival by bonfires, which our 'yule-log,' the 'Souche de Noël,' still keeps in mind; while the adaptation of ancient solar thought to Christian allegory is as plain as ever in the Christian service chant, 'Sol novus oritur.'"—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 298.

sun-rose, s.

Bot.: The genus Helianthemum; spec. H. vulgare.

sun-setting, s. Sunset.

bôil, bôy; pôut, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhün; -tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -ciious, -şious = şhüş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

sun-shade, s. Something used as a shade or protection against the rays of the sun; as—
(1) A parasol or small umbrella.
(2) An awning or canopy projecting over a shop-window, &c.

(3) A small framework covered with silk, &c., in front of a lady's bonnet.

sun-shower, s. A shower occurring while the sun is shining unobscured.

sun-smitten, a. Smitten or lighted by the rays of the sun.

"Sun-smitten Alps." —Tennyson: Daisy, 62.

sun-spot, s.

Astron. (pl.): Certain dark spots seen by the aid of a telescope on the surface of the sun's photosphere. In a normal spot there is an exterior shade called the penumbra, an inner darker one called the umbra, and very often one deeper still in the center called the nucleus. In some there are many umbræ for one penumbra. The domes seen on the surface of the penumbra are drawn into elongate shapes, hence the expression, "the thatch of the penumbra." The spots are believed to be cavities, down which hydrogen is rushing at the rate of thirty or forty miles a second. Large spots commence as little dots, often in groups, and grow very rapidly. They are of two kinds, one more violent than the other. The first may be 140,000 miles long, and are produced by the descent of solid particles into the internal heated region of the photosphere. The second are shallow depressions filled with the cooler vapors brought from the upper region of the solar atmosphere. Sometimes spots last for days, months, or weeks; sometimes they disappear on one part of the sun's disk and appear on another. They are rare at the sun's equator. Their appropriate regions are two zones, one between 10° and 30° north, the other between 10° and 30° south; they are rarely seen higher than 40°. The spots in different latitudes move at different rates. The average time they take to travel all round the luminary is about twenty-six days. The number of sun-spots varies greatly from time to time; but observations for the last three centuries show that a maximum of numbers and intensity recurs, on an average, every eleven years, and is attended by magnetic disturbances on earth.

sun-spurge, s.

Bot.: Euphorbia helioscopia. It has an umbel of five principal branches, five-cleft and three-cleft, and is abundant on waste and cultivated ground, flowering from July to October. The acrid milky juice is used to destroy warts.

sun-squall, s. A sea-nettle.

Zoöl.: Solaster papposa, a star-fish from the North Atlantic.

sun-stricken, a. Stricken by the sun; affected with sunstroke.

sun-temple, s. A temple dedicated to the sun or the sun-god (q. v.).

"The sun-temple [among the Natchez] was a circular hut, some thirty feet across and dome-roofed; here in the midst was kept the everlasting fire, here prayer was offered thrice daily, and here were kept images and fetishes and the bones of dead chiefs."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 288.

sun-worship, s.

Compar. Religions: A form of Nature-worship, widely, though by no means universally, diffused at the present day among races of low culture. The sun would naturally be chosen as a god by agricultural and pastoral peoples, while to races living by the chase the summer heat would not be so advantageous. D'Orbigny (L'Homme Américain, i. 242) suggests that the sun has been worshiped only by races living in temperate climates, where its heat is cheering and vivifying, and that this cultus is practically unknown within the tropics, where the solar heat is oppressive. If not entirely true, this theory contains considerable truth. Herodotus (i. 216, iv. 284) describes the Atlantes, who dwelt in the interior of Africa, as cursing the sun for afflicting them with his burning heat, and Sir Samuel Baker (Albert Nyanza, i. 144) says that in Central Africa "the sun is regarded as the common enemy." Traces of sun-worship appear in the earliest records of the human race. They are present in the old theology of Egypt: "Ra, who traverses the upper and lower regions of the universe in his boat, is the Sun himself in plain cosmic personality." (Tylor.) Putting aside the later sun-gods of Greece and Rome, horses were sacrificed on Mount Taygetus to that Helios to whom Socrates did not think it wrong to pray (Plat., Sympos. xxxvi.); and Cicero (de Nat. Deor., iii. 21) exclaims at the number of Suns set forth by Roman theologians. The worship of Mithra spread from the East into the Roman Empire, and that Vedic divinity was at last identified with the Sun. In the Old Testament there are solemn denunciations of sun-worship sun-worshiper, s. One who worships the sun or the sun-god (q. v.).

(Deut. iv. 19, xvii. 3; Jer. xliii. 13; Ezek. viii. 16-18); for the Israelites were surrounded by sun-worshippers, and it is clear from 2 Kings xxiii. 5, 19, that the rulers of Judah had adopted the cult. Modern Hinduism is full of sun-worship, and it exists as a distinct cultus among the Kol tribes, the Khonds, and the Tartars. It is still widely spread among the native races of Central America, and probably found its highest form of development in Peru, where the Sun was held to be at once the ancestor and founder of the dynasty of the Incas, who reigned as his representative, and made sun-worship the great state-religion.

"In and near Armenia a sect of sun-worshippers have lasted on into modern times under the profession of Jacobite Christians."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 296.

sun-worshipping, a. Adoring the sun or the sun-god (q. v.).

"The feelings with which the sun-worshipping Massagetae of Tartary must have sacrificed their horses to the deity who freed them from the miseries of winter."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 286.

sun-year, s. A solar year.

sūn (2), s. [SUNN.]

sun-plant, s. [SUNN.]

sūn, sunne, v. t. [SUN (1), s.] To expose to the rays of the sun; to warm or dry in the sun; to insolate. (Generally reflexive.)

"What aim'st thou at? delicious fare;

And then to sun thyself in open air."

Dryden: Persius.

sūn'-bēam, s. [A. S. sunnebeām.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A ray of the sun.

"The Roman eagle, wing'd
From the spungy south to this part of the west, Vanish'd in the sunbeams."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iv. 2.

2. Ornith.: Any individual of the Humming-bird genus Aglæactis, with four species from Peru and Bolivia, extending from Ecuador into Colombia.

sūn'-būrn't, sūn'-būrn'd, adj. [Eng. sun (1), s., and burnt.]

1. Discolored by the rays of the sun; tanned, freckled, swarthy.

"He was a man as dusky as a Spaniard, Sunburnt with travel." Byron: Beppo, xxvi.

2. Scorched by the sun; as, a sunburnt soil.

sūn'-būrst, s. [Eng. sun (1), and burst, s.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A sudden flash of sunlight.

2. Her. & Hist.: A flag, having a sun in splendor on a green field. Said to have been the flag of the pagan Irish. Allusions to it are common in Irish national poetry.

"On the front ranks before, Dathi the sunburst bore."

Thomas Davis: Fate of King Dathi.

sūn'-dart, s. [Eng. sun (1), s., and dart, s.] A ray of the sun. (Mrs. Hemans.)

sūn'-dāwn, s. [Eng. sun (1), s., and dawn.] The light of the rising sun.

"Under yon brake where sundawn feeds the stalks Of withered ferns with gold."

Browning: Sordello, bk. ii.

Sūn'-day, Son-day, Sone-day, Son-en-day, s. & a. [A. S. sunnan dæg=day of the sun; Dutch zondag; Dan. søndag; Ger. sonntag.]

A. As subst.: The first day of the week; the Christian Sabbath. [SABBATH.]

B. As adj.: Pertaining, belonging, or relating to the Lord's-day or Christian Sabbath.

¶ Month of Sundays: A long and indefinite period.

"I haven't heard more fluent or passionate English this month of Sundays."—C. Kingsley: Alton Locke, ch. xxvii.

Sunday-closing, s. The principle or practice of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays, or of allowing it only during certain hours.

Sunday-letter, s. The same as DOMINICAL-LETTER (q. v.).

Sunday-saint, s. One whose conduct during the week does not correspond with his professions on Sunday.

Sunday-school, s.

Church History: A Sunday-school is defined by Schaff (Cyclop. Rel. Knowl., iii. 2, 261) as "an assembly of persons on the Lord's day for the study of the Bible, moral and religious instruction, and the worship of the true God. It is a method of training the young and ignorant in the duties we owe to God and to our neighbor." Sunday-schools may be said to have passed through three distinct phases:

1. Early Christian Catechetical Schools, for the preparation of converts for church-membership, and the instruction of the young and ignorant in the knowledge of God and of Salvation. The scholars committed passages of Scripture to memory, and their books comprised parts of the Bible in verse, Jewish antiquities, sacred poems, and dialogues. Schaff remarks that "it might be an interesting problem for a modern scholar to define important features of the present system not to be found in the early Bible Schools."

2. Schools of the Reformation Period: Luther founded schools for catechetical instruction in 1529, and this custom spread wherever the Reformation gained a foothold. In the Roman Church St. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, about 1560, introduced into his diocese a system of schools, which continues to the present day; and in 1699 the Venerable de la Salle opened a Sunday-school (école dominicale) at St. Sulpice. Sunday-schools were opened in Scotland about 1560 by Knox; at Bath, in 1650, by Joseph Alleine; in Roxbury, Mass., in 1674, and at many other places in Great Britain and America between that date and 1778.

3. Modern Sunday Schools: These date from 1780 or 1781, when Robert Raikes, of Gloucester, England, began to collect a few children from the streets of that city on Sundays, and paid teachers to instruct them in religious knowledge. The improvement in the conduct and morals of the children was so marked that, when Raikes published an account of his success, his example was followed in several other places, and in 1785 a society was formed for the establishment and maintenance of Sunday-schools in all parts of the kingdom, a large sum being expended in the payment of teachers. In 1803 the Sunday School Union was formed, to secure continuous instruction by unpaid teachers, and to publish books and tracts for the benefit of the cause. The first Sunday-schools united secular with religious instruction, as did those of Borromeo and La Salle; but the spread of elementary education has to a large extent removed the necessity of teaching reading and writing on Sundays. The Society of Friends has, however, retained the practice in its large Sunday-morning schools, with great benefit as regards influence over the working classes above the age of childhood, and in some of the Wesleyan Sunday-schools, classes for elementary instruction are held early in the morning. Sunday-schools were introduced into Scotland, Ireland, and America in the years immediately following their establishment in England; the Scottish Society for Promoting Religious Instruction among the Poor was formed in 1796, and the Irish Sunday School Society was founded in 1809, though a system of Sunday teaching had prevailed in Ireland for some years previously. In later times Sunday-schools have rapidly increased in connection with all Protestant churches throughout the world.

sūn'-dēr (1) son-dre, sun-dren, v. t. & i. [A. S. sundrian, gesundrian, syndrian (in comp.), lit.=to put asunder, from sundor=asunder; cogn. with Icel. sundra=to sunder, from sundr=asunder; Dan. søndre, from sønder; Sw. söndra, from sönder; Ger. sondern, from sonder=separate; Goth. sundro=separately; Dut. zonder=but.]

A. Trans.: To part, to separate; to set or keep apart; to divide, to disunite, to put apart.

"Ah, ye pretty pair,
'Twere sin to sunder you."

Beaum. & Flét.: Love's Cure, iii. 2.

*B. Intrans.: To part, to separate, to be separated.

"Strangers and foes do sunder and not kiss." Shakesp.: All's Well that Ends Well, ii. 5.

sūn'-dēr (2), v. t. [SUN (1), s. and Eng., dry, v.] To expose to or dry in the sun. (Eng. Prov.) sūn'-dēr, s. [SUNDER, v.] A separation or division into parts. Used only in the adverbial phrase in sunder=in two.

"He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder."—Psalms, xlv. 9.

sūn'-dēr-mēnt, subst. [Eng. sunder; -ment.] Separation.

"The survivor in case of sunderment."—Madame D'Arbelay: Diary, vii. 318.

sūn'-dōwn, s. [Eng. sun (1), s., and down.] The setting of the sun; sunset.

sūn'-drī, s. [SOONDREE.]

sūn'-driē, subst. pl. [SUNDRY.] Various small articles or miscellaneous matters, too minute, trifling, or numerous to be individually specified.

sūn'-drī-lý, sun-dre-ly, sun-der-lye, adv. [Eng. sundry; -ly.]

1. In sundry ways; variously.

"Dyvers auctours . . . dyversly and sunderly reporte and wryte."—Fabyan: Chronycle, ch. cxlvi.

2. Separately; not together.

"[I] have also dyvers and many tymes sunderlye talked with almost all such."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 235.

sūn'-drý, son-drie, son-dry, a. & adv. [A. S. syndrig, from sundor=asunder, apart.]

A. As adj.: Several, divers; more than one or two; various.

"Those three in these three rowmes did sondry dwell."
Spenser: F. Q., II. ix. 48.

¶ All and sundry: All, collectively and individually.

sundry-man, subst. A dealer in sundries or in a variety of different articles.

sünd'-vik-ite, subst. [After Sundvik, Finland, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An altered anorthite (q. v.).

sune, adv. [SOON.] (Scotch.) sūn'-flōw-ēr, s. [English sun, and flower. The name is popularly accounted for by the assertion, which has no foundation in fact, that these flowers turn so as to follow the sun in its course. It probably has reference to the resemblance of the flower to the disk of the sun surrounded by rays.]

Botany:

1. Helianthus annuus, an annual, herbaceous, composite plant, six to twenty feet high. The leaves, which are rough, are subcordate, crenulate, or dentate, the heads of flowers one to two feet in diameter, the florets yellow. It is a native of Mexico and Peru. In northern latitudes it flowers in July and August, but is of less height and has smaller flowers than in its native country. Its seeds yield a useful oil, sometimes used for the table; they are also eaten with avidity by cows, horses, and poultry. The liber furnishes a good fiber; the pith is used in Russia for moxa. The quantity of niter in the stalk makes it good fuel when dry. Since the æsthetic movement, which began about 1875, the sunflower has been much used in decoration.

2. Helianthemum vulgare.

"Round her spread board the golden sunflowers shine."
D. G. Rossetti: Wine of Circe.

¶ The Little Sunflower: Calendula officinalis. (Treas. of Bot.)

"Her mightie tresses of her sonnīsh heres

Unbroiden, hangen all about her eares."

Chaucer: Troilus and Creseide, iv.

Sūn'-nīte, Sōn'-nīte, s. [Arab. sunn(a); Eng. suff. -ite.]

Mohammedanism (pl.): One of the two great Mohammedan parties or sects, divided into four minor sects, the Hanefites, the Malekites, the Shafites, and the Hanbalites. They consider the Sunna (q. v.) binding, placing it on the same footing as to authority with the Koran. They wear white turbans, and are deemed orthodox. They regard Abu Bekr, Omar, and Osman as having been true Kaliphs. The Turks, the Arabs, and the majority of the Indian Mohammedans are Sunnites.

sūn'-nūd, s. [Hind. sunnad.] A patent, charter, or written authority. (East Indies.)

sūn'-nŷ, a. [Eng. sun (1), s.; -y.]

"Her sunny locks

Hang on her temples like a golden fleece."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

2. Proceeding from the sun.

"There he him found all carelessly dislaid,

In secrete shadow from the sunny ray."

Spenser: F. Q., II. v. 32.

3. Exposed to the rays of the sun; warmed, brightened, or lighted by the sunlight; bright, cheerful, warm. (Lit. & fig.)

"The sunny hills from far were seen to glow."

Dryden: Hind and Panther, iii. 556.

sunny-sweet, a. Rendered sweet or pleasantly bright by the sun.

sunny-warm, adj. Warmed or cheered by the sun; sunny.

sūn'-proōf, adj. [Eng. sun (1), s., and proof, a. (q. v).] Impervious to the rays of the sun.

"Thick arms of darksome yew, sunproof."

Marston.

sūn'-rīse, sonne-ryse, s. [Eng. sun (1), s., and rise, s.]

1. The rise or first appearance of the sun above the horizon in the morning, or the atmospheric phenomena accompanying the rising of the sun; the time of the rising of the sun.

"At sunrise she escaped their van."

Macaulay: The Armada.

2. The region, place, or quarter where the sun rises; the east.

sunrise-glow, s.

Physics: A glow sometimes seen at or about sunrise, resembling a sunset-glow (q. v.), but reflected downward instead of upward.

"On the morning of the 7th inst., a curious form of sunrise-glow was observed on Ben Nevis."—Nature, March 25, 1886, p. 487.

sūn'-rīš-īng, s. [Eng. sun (1), s., and rising.]

1. The rising of the sun above the horizon; sunrise.

2. The quarter where the sun rises; the east.

I. Literally:

1. The setting of the sun; the descent of the sun below the horizon; the atmospheric phenomena accompanying the setting of the sun; the time when the sun sets; evening.

*2. The region or quarter where the sun sets; the west.

*II. Fig.: The close or decline.

"'Tis the sunset of life gives me mystical lore."

Campbell: Lochiel's Warning.

Physics: An abnormally brilliant coloring of the sky at sunset, followed by an after-glow, or re-illumination, observed at many places about and after the period of the Krakatoa eruption (Aug. 26, 1883), though the hypothesis that the sunset-glows were caused by the eruption is a matter of controversy. Professor Kiessling, of Hamburg, maintains that "An intense purple glow, visible over a considerable area, may occur when, in close proximity beneath a lofty and highly attenuated haze, there is formed an extensive stratum of air of considerably higher temperature." (Nature, October 29, 1885, p. 637.)

sunset-shell, s. [PSAMMOBIA.]

sūn'-shīne, s. & a. [Eng. sun (1), s., and shine (q. v.).]

sū-pēr-crēs-çençe, s. [Lat. super=above, and crescens, pr. par. of cresco=to grow.] That which grows upon another growing thing; a parasite.

"Wherever it [the mistletoe] groweth, it is of constant shape, and maintains a regular figure, like other super-crescences, and such as living upon the stock of others are termed parasitical plants."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii., ch. vi.

sū-pēr-crēs-çent, adj. [SUPERCRESCENCE.] Growing upon some other growing thing; parasitic.

sū-pēr-crē-tā-çē-ōūs (or ceous as shus), adj. [SUPRACRETACEOUS.]

sū-pēr-crit-ic-āl, a. [Pref. super-, and Eng. critical.] Excessively critical; hypercritical. (Gauden: Tears of the Church, p. 15.)

sū-pēr-cūr-i-ōūs, adj. [Pref. super-, and Eng. curious (q. v.).] Excessively or exceedingly curious.

sū-pēr-dōm-in-ant, s. [Pref. super-, and Eng. dominant (q. v.).]

Music: The note above the dominant; the sixth note of the diatonic scale; thus A is the superdominant in the scale of C, E in the scale of G, &c.

sū-pēr-ēm-in-ençe, sū-pēr-ēm-in-en-çy, s. [Pref. super-, and Eng. eminence, eminency.] The quality or state of being supereminent; distinguished or extraordinary eminence or superiority.

"The Archbishop of Canterbury, as he is primate over all England and metropolitan, has a supereminency, and even some power over the Archbishop of York."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

sū-pēr-ēm-in-ent, a. [Pref. super-, and Eng. eminent (q. v.).] Eminent in a superior or extraordinary degree; surpassing others in excellence, power, authority, or the like; preëminent.

"The brute force of the king was sharpened by super-eminent powers of intellect, without the slightest tinge of morality."—Gardiner & Mullinger: Introd. to Eng. Hist., ch. iii.

sū-pēr-ēm-in-ent-lý, adverb. [Eng. supereminent; -ly.] In a supereminent manner or degree; in a degree of excellence, authority, power, &c., surpassing all others; preëminently.

"A being absolutely perfect has these, or what supereminently contains these."—More: Antidote against Atheism, bk. i., ch. v.

sū-pēr-ēr-ō-gant, a. [Lat. supererogans, pr. par. of supererogo=to pay out beyond what is due: super=over, above, and erogo=to lay out money; z=out, and rogo=to ask.] Supererogatory.

sū-pēr-ēr-ō-gāte, v. int. [Lat. supererogatus, pa. par. of supererogo.] [SUPEREROGATE.] To do more than duty requires; to make up some deficiency in another by extraordinary exertion.

"Thus Aristotle acted his own instructions; and his obsequious sectators have supererogated in observance."—Glanvill: Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xvii.

sū-pēr-ēr-ō-gā-tion, subst. [SUPEREROGATE.] The act of one who supererogates; the performance of more than duty requires.

¶ (1) Doctrine of supererogation:

Church Hist.: The doctrine, founded on that of the communion of saints, that the merit of good works done by one Christian belongs to the whole body of the faithful. The principle was affirmed in the Institution of a Christian Man published by authority of Convocation (A. D. 1537):

"I believe that whatsoever spiritual gift or treasure is given by God unto any one part or member of this mystical body of Christ, although the same be given particularly unto this member, and not unto another, yet the fruit and merit thereof shall, by reason of that incommensurable union and bond of charity which is between them, redound necessarily unto the profit, edifying, and increase in Christ's Body of all other members particularly."

The Council of Trent decreed nothing on the subject, but the language of the Tridentine Catechism (pt. i., ch. x., q. 23) is in accord with that quoted above. At the time of the Reformation the sale of indulgences had brought discredit on the doctrine of supererogation, or, "as it might more properly be called, the communion of saints in good works," and Article XIV. was directed against the popular belief. (Blunt.)

(2) Works of supererogation.

Church Hist.: A controversial phrase borrowed from Article XIV. of the Church of England, and there defined as "voluntary works, besides, over, and above God's Commandments." In this sense the expression is used chiefly of the Counsels of perfection—Poverty, Chastity, and Obedience—which, according to Roman theologians, though not universally necessary to salvation, are yet necessary, and become absolute precepts, in the case of those called to such states of life.

sū-pēr-ēr-ō-gā-tive, a. [Eng. supererogat(e); -ive.] The same as SUPEREROGATORY (q. v.).

"Another of an high-birth and low-stooping spirit, who can justly brag of nothing of his own, but live upon the supererogative deeds of his ancestors."—Stafford: Niobe, pt. ii., p. 61.

sū-pēr-ēr-ō-gā-tōr-y, a. [Eng. supererat(e); -ory.] Partaking of the nature of supererogation; performed beyond what duty strictly requires.

"Supererogatory services, and too great benefits from subjects to kings, are of dangerous consequence."—Howell.

sū-pēr-ēs-sēn-tiāl (t as sh), a. [Pref. super-, and Eng. essential (q. v.).] Essential above others, or above the constitution of a thing.

"But the spirit of God was the vehicle of the eternal wisdom and of the superessential goodness."—More: Philos. Cabbala, ch. i.

sū-pēr-ēth-ic-āl, a. [Pref. super-, and English ethical (q. v.).] Transcending the ordinary rules of ethics; more than ethical; of greater authority than ethics.

"Moral theology contains a superethical doctrine, as some grave divines have ridiculously called it."—Bolingbroke: Auth. in Matters of Religion, § 6.

sū-pēr-ēx-ālt, v. t. [Pref. super-, and English exalt (q. v.).] To exalt to a superior degree; to exalt to a position or rank above all others.

"Having superexalted him, and bestowed on him a name above all names."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 31.

sū-pēr-ēx-ālt-tā-tion, subst. [Pref. super-, and English exaltation (q. v.).] Elevation above all others; elevation in a superior or preëminent degree.

"In a superexaltation of courage, they seem as greedy of death as of victory."—Holtyday.

sū-pēr-ēx-çel-lençe, s. [Pref. super-, and Eng. excellence (q. v.).] Superior excellence.

sū-pēr-ēx-çel-lent, a. [Pref. super-, and Eng. excellent (q. v.).] Excellent in an unusual or extraordinary degree.

"Something so superexcellent, that all must reverence and adore."—Decay of Piety.

sū-pēr-ēx-crēs-çençe, s. [Pref. super-, and Eng. excrecence (q. v.).] Something superfluously growing.

"I rubbed the superexcrecence with a vitriol stone."—Wiseman: Surgery, bk. iv., ch. v.

sū-pēr-fē-cūn-dā-tion, s. [Pref. super-, and Eng. fecundation (q. v.).] The impregnation of a woman already pregnant; superfetation, superconception.

sū-pēr-fē-cūn-dī-tý, s. [Pref. super-, and Eng. fecundity (q. v.).] Superabundant fecundity or multiplication of the species.

"In strict connection with another property of animal nature, viz., superfecundity."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. xxvi.

sū-pēr-fē-tāte, v. i. [Lat. superfetatus, pa. par. of superfeto; super=above, after, and feto=to breed.] To conceive after a prior conception.

"The female brings forth twice in one month, and so is said to superfete, which, saith Aristotle, is because her eggs are hatched in her one after another."—Grew: Museum.

sū-pēr-fē-tā-tion, sū-pēr-fœ-tā-tion, s. [SUPERFETATE.]

1. Lit. & Forensic Medicine: The conception of a second embryo during the gestation of the first; the products of the two conceptions being born together or at different times. Early authorities were strongly convinced that superfetation was not only possible, but common, and though in the present day opinion is divided on the subject, many cases are quoted of which it is claimed that no other explanation than superfetation is possible. Woodman & Tidy (Forensic Medicine, p. 819) suggest that many of these may be accounted for by the fact that the uterus is sometimes found to be double, and in others they doubt the accuracy of the recorded observations; adding: "There is a residuum of unexplained cases, and without pronouncing formally in favor of the doctrine of superfetation, we must admit that it is difficult to explain some of the recorded facts on any other supposition than that a second impregnation took place, while the uterus or womb contained one ovum or foetus partially developed."

*2. Fig.: An excrescent growth.

sū-pēr-fête, v. t. & i. [Lat. superfeto.] [SUPERFETATE.]

A. Trans.: To superfetate.

"It makes me pregnant and to superfete; Such is the vigor of his beams and heat."—Howell: Royal Present to His Majesty (1641).

B. Intrans.: To conceive after a former conception.

sū-pēr-flçe, s. [Fr. superficie.] A surface; a superficies (q. v.).

"Then if it rise not to the former height Of superfice, conclude that soil is light."—Dryden: Virgil, Georgic ii. 316.

sū-pēr-flç-ial (c as sh), su-per-fl-ç-ial, adj. [Fr. superficiel, from Lat. superficialis.]

1. Lit.: Pertaining to or lying on the superficies or surface; not penetrating below the surface; not sinking deep.

"From these phenomena several have concluded some general rupture in the superficial parts of the earth."—Burnet: Theory of the Earth.

2. Fig.: Reaching or comprehending only what is obvious or apparent; not deep, profound, or penetrating; not learned or thorough; shallow.

"His knowledge both of the Church which he quitted and of the Church he entered was of the most superficial kind."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

superficial-deposits, s. pl.

Geology: Deposits on or near the surface of the ground, and belonging to the recent period, as vegetable soil, gravel, clay, peat (q. v.), &c. [RECENT, II.]

superficial-fascia, s.

Anatomy: The layer of loose tissue, of varying density, immediately below the skin in every part of the body. It contains the subcutaneous fat, and in some places superficial muscles. Called also the Subcutaneous fascia.

sū-pēr-flç-ial-ist (c as sh), s. [Eng. superficial; -ist.] One who attends to anything superficially; one who has only a superficial knowledge in, or acquaintance with, anything; a sciolist, a smatterer.

sū-pēr-flç-ial-ist-ty (c as sh), su-per-fl-ç-ial-y-te, s. [O. Fr. superficialité.]

1. The quality or state of being superficial; shallowness.

"The colors of bodies are sensibly qualified, and receive degrees of luster or obscurity, superficiality or profundity."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vi., ch. x.

2. That which is superficial or shallow; a superficial person or thing.

sū-pēr-flç-ial-ize (c as sh), v. t. [Eng. superficial; -ize.] To treat or regard in a superficial, slight, or shallow manner.

sū-pēr-flç-ial-lý, (c as sh), adv. [Eng. superficial; -ly.]

*1. In a superficial manner; on the surface only; as, a thing superficially colored.

2. Without close attention; without penetration; without going deeply into matters; slightly; not thoroughly.

"It is no wonder if many considering their theology but slightly and superficially have been led into an error."—Cudworth: Intel. System, p. 256.

sū-pēr-flç-ial-nēss (c as sh), s. [Eng. superficial; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being superficial; position on the surface; shallowness.

2. Shallowness of observation or knowledge; show without substance.

sū-pēr-flç-i-ā-rý (c as sh), a. & s. [Lat. superficiarius.]

A. As adjective:

*1. Ord. Lang.: Situated on the surface; superficial.

"The outermost and superficiary parts of the body."—Venner: Treatise of Tobacco, p. 411.

2. Law: Situated on another man's land. (Smith.)

B. As substantive:

Law: One to whom a right of surface is granted; one who pays the quit-rent of a house built on another man's ground.

sū-pēr-flç-i-ēs (c as sh), s. [Lat., from super=above, and facies=a face. Superficies and surface are doublets.]

1. Ord. Lang. & Geom.: The surface; the area of a surface. It may be rectilinear, curvilinear, plane, convex, or concave. It consists of length and breadth without thickness, and therefore forms no part of the substance or solid contents of a body. The difference between this term and the term surface, is simply this: The term surface is abstract, and simply implies that magnitude which has length and breadth without thickness, while the term superficies does not refer to the nature of the magnitude, but simply refers to the number of units of surface which the given surface contains.

"The idea of filling a place equal to the contents of its superficies, being annexed to our idea of body, I think it is a self-evident proposition, that two bodies cannot be in the same place."—Locke: Hum. Underst., bk. iv., ch. viii.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -clan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

2. Law: Everything on the surface of a piece of ground or of a building which is closely connected with it by art or nature, so as to constitute a part of the same, as houses, trees and the like; particularly everything connected with another's ground, and especially a real right that is granted to a person. (Burrill.)

su-pêr-fine', a. [Pref. super-, and Eng. fine, a. (q. v.).] 1. Exceedingly or remarkably fine; very fine; surpassing others in fineness or quality; as, superfine cloth.

*2. Excessively or faultily nice or subtle; over nice, over subtle.

"Thus much for them that out of a superfine daintiness cannot live but by sweetmeats."—Venner: Via Recta, p. 248.

sû-pêr-fine'-ness, subst. [Eng. superfine; -ness.] The quality or state of being superfine.

sû-pêr-fîn'-ic-al, adj. [Pref. super-, and Eng. finical (q. v.).] Spruce or foppish in the highest degree.

"A superfinical rogue."

Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 2. (Quartos.)

su-per-flue, a. [Fr. superflu, from Lat. superfluus.] Superfluous (q. v.).

sû-pêr-flû-ençe, s. [Lat. super=above, over, and fluens, pr. par. of fluo=to flow.] That which is superfluous; a superfluity.

"The superfluence of grace is ordinarily proportioned to the faithful discharge of former trusts, making use of the foregoing sufficient grace."—Hammond.

sû-pêr-flû-ît-ançe, s. [Eng. superfluitan(t); -ce.] The act or state of floating over or on the surface; that which floats on the surface.

"Out of the cream, or superfluitance, the finest dishes are made; out of the residence, the coarser."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii., ch. v.

sû-pêr-flû-ît-ant, a. [Lat. superfluitans, pr. par. of superfluito; super=above, and fluito, intens. of fluo=to flow.] Floating above or on the surface.

sû-pêr-flû-ît-ÿ, *su-per-flu-it-e, *su-per-flu-ît-ie, s. [Fr. superfluité, from Lat. superfluitatem, accus. of superfluitas, from superfluus=superfluous (q. v.); Sp. superfluidad; Ital. superfluità.] 1. The quality or state of being superfluous.

"Grose disease
Soone growes through humour's superfluitie."
Spenser: Ruins of Rome.

2. A quantity that is superfluous or in excess; a quantity greater than is needed; superabundance, redundancy.

"The superfluity and waste of wit."—Dryden: Evening's Love. (Pref.)

3. Something more or beyond what is necessary; something used or kept for show or luxury rather than for comfort or necessity; something which could easily be dispensed with.

"Nor did anything we offered them appear acceptable but beads, as an ornamental superfluity of life."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. i., ch. v.

¶ For the difference between superfluity and excess, see EXCESS.

sû-pêr-flû-ôus, a. [Lat. superfluus=overflowing, from super=above, over, and fluo=to flow; Fr. superflu; Sp. & Port. superfluo.] 1. More than is necessary or sufficient; unnecessary, from being in excess of what is needed; excessive, superabundant, redundant.

"Superfluous branches we lop away."
Shakesp.: Richard II., iii. 4.

*2. Overflowing, exuberant.

"Dout them with superfluous courage."
Shakesp.: Henry V., iv. 2.

*3. Too great or high; excessive.

"Purchased at a superfluous rate."
Shakesp.: Henry VIII., i. 1.

*4. Having more than is necessary; supplied with superfluities.

"The superfluous and lust-dieted man."
Shakesp.: Lear, iv. 1.

*5. Unnecessarily concerned about anything.

"I see no reason why thou shouldst be so superfluous to demand the time of the day."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., i. 2.

superfluous-interval, s.

Music: An interval greater by a semitone than major or perfect.

superfluous-polygamy, s.

Bot.: The term applied when in a composite flower the florets of the disc are hermaphrodite and bear seeds, and the flowers of the ray, which are only female, do so likewise, so that the latter appear superfluous. Linnæus ranked the plants thus constituted under Polygamia superflua, which he made an order of the class Syngenesia.

sû-pêr-flû-ôus-lÿ, adv. [Eng. superfluously; -ly.] In a superfluous manner or degree; in or to a degree beyond what is necessary; with, to, or in excess.

"Doing nothing superfluously or in vain."—More: Antidote against Atheism, bk. ii., ch. ix.

sû-pêr-flû-ôus-ness, sub. [Eng. superfluously; -ness.] The quality or state of being superfluous; superfluity.

sû-pêr-flûx, sub. [Pref. super-, and Eng. flux (q. v.).] That which is superfluous, or is more than is wanted; a superfluity.

"Leavings of life, the superflux of death."

A. C. Swinburne: Tristram of Lyonesse. (Pref.)

sû-pêr-fœ-tâ-tion, s. [SUPERFETATION.]

sû-pêr-fô-li-â-tion, s. [Pref. super-, and Eng. foliation (q. v.).] Excessive foliation.

"This, in the pathology of plants, may be the disease of superfoliation, mentioned by Theophrastus."—Browne: Miscellany Tracts i.

sû-pêr-frôn-tal, sub. [Pref. super-, and Eng. frontal (q. v.).]

Eccles.: The part of an altar-cloth that covers the top, as distinguished from the antependium, or part which hangs down in front.

sû-pêr-fûse, v. t. [Lat. superfusus, pa. par. of superfundo=to pour over or upon; super=over, and fundo=to pour.] To pour over or on the top of.

"Pouring first a very cold liquor into a glass, and then superfusing on it another."—Evelyn: Diary, Dec. 13, 1685.

sû-pêr-hêat, v. t. [Pref. super-, and Eng. heat, v. (q. v.).] To heat to an extreme degree, or to a very high temperature; specifically, to heat, as steam, apart from contact with water until it resembles a perfect gas. [STEAM.]

sû-pêr-hêat'-êd, pa. par. or a. [SUPERHEAT.] superheated-steam, s.

Physics: Steam to which an additional amount of heat has been given to that required for its production from water. No advantage is gained by heating steam above 315° Fahr.

sû-pêr-hêat-êr, subst. [Pref. super-, and Eng. heater (q. v.).]

Steam Engin.: A contrivance for increasing the temperature of the steam to the amount it would lose on its way from the boiler until exhausted from the cylinder. This end is frequently attained by making the steam travel through a number of small tubes several times across the uptake or foot of the chimney before it enters the steam-pipe.

sû-pêr-hêr'-ê-sÿ, subst. [Pref. super-, and Eng. heresy.] A heresy arising out of a former heresy; the further corruption of erroneous teaching.

"Even in the doctrines heretical there will be superheresies."—Browne: Religio Medici, sect. 8.

sû-pêr-hive, subst. [Pref. super-, and Eng. hive (q. v.).] A kind of upper story to a hive, removable at pleasure.

sû-pêr-hû-man, adj. [Pref. super-, and Eng. human.] Above or beyond what is human; above the power or nature of man.

sû-pêr-hû-mêr-al, s. [Lat. super=above, and humerus=the shoulder.] *1. Ord. Lang.: A burden, a load.

"A strange superhumeral, the print whereof was to be seen on his shoulders."—Andrews: Sermons, i. 25.

2. Eccles.: A term of no very definite application, being sometimes applied to an archbishop's pallium and sometimes to an amice. (Pugin.)

sû-pêr-hû-mêr-âte, v. t. [SUPERHUMERAL.] To place over or on one's shoulders; hence, to assist in bearing, as a burden.

"Freely to superhumerate the burthen which was his."—Feltham: Resolves, pt. i., res. 82.

sû-pêr-îm-pôse, v. t. [Pref. super-, and Eng. impose (q. v.).] To lay or impose upon something else.

"The mixed clay or 'paste' or 'body' varied in composition according to the nature of the glaze to be superimposed."—Fortnum: Majolica, p. 4.

sû-pêr-îm-pô-si-tion, s. [Pref. super-, and Eng. imposition (q. v.).] The act of superimposing; the state of being superimposed.

sû-pêr-îm-prêg-nâ-tion, s. [Pref. super-, and Eng. impregnation (q. v.).] The act of impregnating upon a prior impregnation; superfetation, superconception.

sūp-pū-rāte, v. i. & t. [Latin suppuratus, pa. par. of suppuro=to gather pus underneath: sup (for sub)=under, and pus (genit. puris)=pus.]

A. Intrans.: To grow to pus; to generate pus.

*B. Trans.: To cause to generate pus.

"In the space of three weeks it suppurated it."—Wiseman: Surgery, bk. iv., ch. iv.

sūp-pū-rā-tion, s. [Fr., from Latin suppurationem, accus. of suppuratio, from suppuratus, pa. par. of suppuro=to suppurate (q. v.).]

1. The process of producing pus or purulent matter, as in a wound or abscess.

¶ An important part in this process is played by bacteria.

"The two varieties of germs which most commonly cause this inflammation and suppuration are the staphylococcus pyogenes, so called because it is found in bunches, and the streptococcus pyogenes, so called because it is found in chains. The germ itself does not do the harm, but it secretes a poison which causes inflammation and suppuration."—Dr. Walter B. Peet: New York Herald, July 24, 1898.

2. The matter generated by suppuration.

"Those impostumes or swellings, that grow to an head or suppuration (which the Greeks call Apostemata)."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xx., ch. iii.

sūp'-pū-rā-tive, a. & s. [Fr. suppuratif.]

A. As adj.: Tending to produce pus or purulent matter; attended by suppuration; as, suppurative phlebitis.

B. As subst.: A medicine or preparation that promotes suppuration.

"I applied over the whole tumor some of the suppuratives set down in the method of cure."—Wiseman: Surgery, bk. iv., ch. iv.

sūp'-pū-tāte*, s. [Latin supputatus, pa. par. of supputo=to reckon: sup (for sub)=under, and puto=to reckon.] To reckon, to compute.

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Supralapsarians or their doctrine.

"The sublapsarian way seemed to me of the two the more moderate; the rigid supralapsarian doctrine would never find entertainment in my thoughts."—Hammond: Works, i. 669.

B. As substantive:

Church Hist. (pl.): Calvinists who held that God for his own glory eternally decreed the fall of man and the consequent introduction of sin into the world, and that the election of some to everlasting life, with the rejection of others, was formed "beyond" or before, and was in no way consequent or dependent upon the foreseen fall of man. Of this school were Beza, Francis Gomarus, and Voetius. Opposed to Infralapsarian (q. v.).

sū-prā-lāp-sār'-ī-an-īsm, s. [Eng. supralapsarian; -ism.] The doctrine or the tenets of the Supralapsarians.

sū-prā-mūn'-dāne, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. mundane (q. v.).] Situated or being above the world; celestial.

"The later Platonists supposed the world and all the inferior gods (as Plato and the Pythagoreans, some supramundane deities), to proceed, by way of emanation, without any temporary production, from a superior cause."—Waterland: Works, i. 86.

sū-prā-nāt'-ū-rāl, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. natural.] Supernatural; transcending human power or ability.

¶ The supranatural: That which transcends human power or ability.

sū-prā-nāt'-ū-rāl-īsm, s. [Ger. supranaturalismus, from Lat. supra=above, and Eccles. Lat. naturalismus=rationalism.]

Church Hist.: A term first employed in Germany toward the close of the eighteenth century to designate the belief of orthodox Protestants. Now used in a much wider sense, so as to include any doctrine appealing to revelation as its authority.

"At its first appearance the opposite of rationalism was not designated as supranaturalism, but simply as protestantism. As the champions, however, of protestantism, that is, of the theology based upon Scripture as the divine revelation, generally designated their adversaries, not as rationalists, but as naturalists, it naturally came to pass that their own views were designated as supranaturalism."—Schaff: Encyc. Rel. Knowl., iii. 1,995.

sū-prā-nāt'-ū-rāl-ist, s. & a. [English supranatural(ism); -ist.]

A. As substantive:

Church Hist.: One who believes in revealed as distinct from natural religion. [SUPRANATURALISM.]

"What reason cannot comprehend and accept can never form part of the rationalistic convictions. . . . The supranaturalist, on the other hand, is no less in harmony with his fundamental maxim. In matters of religion, Scripture is to him what reason is to the rationalist. Though he too employs reason, he employs it only to search and judge those claims to a divine origin which Scripture puts forth; and as soon as that point has been decided, and he feels convinced that Scripture contains the direct teachings of God, it becomes his highest, his sole authority."—Schaff: Encyc. Rel. Knowl., iii. 1,995.

B. As adj.: Founded on or pertaining to revelation; accepting revelation.

"The successors of their supernaturalist adversaries."—Schaff: Encyc. Rel. Knowl., iii. 1,996.

sū-prā-nāt'-ū-rāl-ist'-īc, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. naturalistic (q. v.).] Supernaturalistic.

"The supranaturalistic and rationalistic opinions."—Strauss: Life of Jesus (ed. Evans.), i. 11.

Compar. Anat.: The bone which completes the first cranial segment above, answering to the occipital bone in man.

sū-prā-prō-tēst, s. [Pref. supra-, and English protest (q. v.).]

Law: An acceptance of a bill by a third person, after protest for non-acceptance by the drawer.

sū-prā-rā-tion-āl-īsm*, s. [Ger. suprarationalismus.] A word suggested as a more fitting term to express what is known as supranaturalism. (See extract under SUPRANATURALISM.)

sū-prā-rē-nāl, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. renal (q. v.).]

Anat.: Situated or being above the kidneys.

suprarenal-capsules, s. pl.

1. Compar. Anat.: Two flattened bodies of crescentic or bent triangular form, one surmounting each kidney, attaining a disproportionately large size in the foetal state in man and the Quadrumana. The right capsule is placed lower down than the left. They are an inch and a quarter to an inch and three-quarters high, an inch and a quarter wide, and two to three lines thick. Their weight in an adult is one or two drachms. They are fibrous, composed principally of simple or closed vesicles resembling the secreting glands, except that they have no duct. Their function is unknown. Called also Suprarenal Glands or Bodies.

2. Path.: In 1855, Dr. Thomas Addison attempted to prove that a disease, often attended by bronze skin, and fatal in from six months to five years, has its seat in the suprarenal capsules. [BRONZED, ¶.]

sū-prā-scāp'-ū-lar-ŷ, sū-prā-scāp'-ū-lar, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. scapulary, scapular (q. v.).]

sū-prā-vūl'-gar, adj. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. vulgar (q. v.).] Being above the vulgar or common people.

"None of these motives can prevail with a man to furnish himself with supravulgar and noble qualities."—Collier.

sū-prēm'-ā-čy, subst. [French suprémie, from suprême=supreme (q. v.).] The quality or state of being supreme, or in the highest station of power; highest or supreme authority or power.

¶ (1) Oath of supremacy: An oath required to be taken in Great Britain along with the oath of allegiance, denying the supremacy of the pope in ecclesiastical or temporal matters in that realm. It has now been greatly modified and simplified.

(2) Papal supremacy:

Eccles. & Church History: The authority, partly spiritual and partly temporal, which the Pope, as bishop of Rome and successor of St. Peter, claims to exercise over the clergy, and, through them, over the laity, of the whole world. The development of this supremacy dates from the time when Christianity became the State religion of the Roman empire under Constantine. Its influence was great in England under the Norman kings, and reached its highest point in the reign of John (1199-1216), from which period it began to decline, and received its death-blow from the Act of Supremacy (26 Henry VIII., c. 1).

(3) Royal supremacy:

Church History: The supremacy in the Church of England, as by law established, of the temporal power in all causes purely temporal, and in the temporal accidents of spiritual things. (Shipley.) By 26 Henry VIII., c. 1, the king was declared to be the "only supreme Head on earth of the Church of England," though it was expressly declared that he did not "pretend to take any power from the successors of the apostles that was given them by God." In the same year (1535) Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More were beheaded for denying the royal claim. On the accession of Elizabeth the title was kept in the background; but the supremacy of the sovereign in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as civil, was asserted. The Royal Supremacy was one of the main causes of the civil war in the seventeenth century; it received a check at the Revolution of 1688, which enforced toleration of Nonconformity, but in the latter half of the nineteenth century more than one clergyman has been committed to prison for disobeying the ruling of the law courts in ecclesiastical matters.

"Surd modes of articulation."—Kenrick: (Goodrich).

II. Technically:

1. Math.: Applied to a quantity not capable of being expressed in rational numbers; as, a surd expression or quantity. [B. 1.]

2. Phonetics: Uttered with breath and not with voice; not sonant, toneless; applied, specifically, to the hard, mute consonants of the alphabet. [B. 2.]

B. As substantive:

1. Math.: An irrational quantity; a quantity which is incommensurable to unity; the root of a quantity when that quantity is not a complete power of the dimension required by the index of the root; hence, the roots of such quantities cannot be expressed by rational numbers. Thus the square root of 2, or the cube root of 4, &c., are surds.

2. Phonetics: A consonantal sound uttered with breath and not with voice; a non-sonant consonant, as, p, f, s, t, k.

sūrd'-al, adj. [Eng. surd; -al.] The same as SURD (q. v.).

sūrd'-dī-tās, s. [Lat.] Deafness; hardness of hearing.

sūrd'-ī-tŷ, s. [Fr. surdité, from Lat. surditatem, accus. of surditas.] Deafness; hardness of hearing.

sūre (s as sh), sur, seur, a. & adv. [O. Fr. sur, seür, segur, from Lat. securus=secure (q. v.); Fr. sür.]

A. As adjective:

*1. Secure, safe; out of danger.

*2. Betrothed; engaged to marry.

"The king was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucy, and her husband before God."—More: Hist. Richard III.

3. Perfectly confident or undoubting; certain of one's facts, position, or the like; certainly knowing and believing; trusting implicitly; having no fear of being deceived, disappointed, or found at fault; assured.

"I am sure she is not buried."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, iv. 2.

4. Fit, proper, or deserving to be depended on; certain not to disappoint or come short of expectation; certain, infallible, stable; not liable to change, loss, or failure.

"The testimony of the Lord is sure."—Psalms xix. 7.

5. Certain to find, gain, or retain; as, to be sure of life or health.

B. As adverb:

1. Safely, securely.

"Open perils surest answered."

Shakesp.: Julius Caesar, iv. 1.

2. Unfailingly, infallibly, surely.

"I know most sure, my art is not past power."

Shakesp.: All's Well, ii. 1.

3. Firmly, securely.

"To . . . sure bind this knot of amity."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., v. 1.

¶ It is frequently inserted by way of asseveration.

"'Tis pleasant, sure, to see one's name in print."

Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, 51.

¶ For the difference between sure and certain, see CERTAIN.

¶ 1. Sure as a gun: Most certainly, most assuredly; unfailingly; absolutely certain. (Colloq.)

2. To be sure: Without doubt; certainly; of course.

3. To make sure:

(1) To make certain or secure; to secure so that there can be no possibility of failure or disappointment.

"Give diligence to make your calling and election sure."—2 Peter i. 10.

*(2) To make fast by betrothal; to betroth.

sūred (s as sh), a. [Eng. sur(e); -ed.] Assured.

"For ever lamed of our sured might."

Sidney: Arcadia, p. 443.

sūr'-ēd-lŷ (s as sh), adv. [Eng. sured; -ly.] Certainly, safely, securely.

"He that walks moderately, is always with himself, directeth his business with better advantage, and more suredly and cheerfully."—Lennard: Of Wisdom, bk. ii., ch. ii., § 10.

sūre'-foot-ēd (s as sh), a. [English sure, and footed.]

1. Lit.: Treading firmly; having a firm, steady tread; not liable to stumble, slide, or fall.

2. Fig.: Not liable to slip or err; trustworthy.

"That safe and surefooted interpreter, Alex. Aphrodisius, expounds his master's meaning."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 170.

sūre'-lŷ (s as sh), sure-lye, adverb. [Eng. ish sure; -ly.]

*1. Firmly, stably, securely.

"That I may surely keep mine oath."

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 2.

2. Certainly, infallibly, assuredly.

"In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."—Genesis ii. 17.

¶ Surely is frequently used by way of asseveration; as:

"Surely

It is a sleepy language."

Shakesp.: Tempest, ii. 1.

Or, as nearly equivalent to an interrogative; as, Surely, you do not think so? = You do not think so, do you? or, as expressing a doubt in the mind of the speaker; as, Surely he cannot have said so?

sūre'-ment (s as sh), s. [Eng. sure; -ment.] Security for payment.

"I you release, madame, into your hond

Quit every surement and every bond."

Chaucer: C. T., 11,837.

sūre'-ness (s as sh), s. [Eng. sure; -ness.] The quality or state of being sure or certain; certainty, security.

"They were in doubt which was the right way they were obliged to keep, and therefore for sureness they would keep both."—Sharp: Sermons, vol. iv., ser. 13.

sūreš'-bŷ (s as sh), s. [Eng. sure; s connect., and boy.] Modeled on the Shakesperian word rudesby (q. v.). One to be sure of; a person to be relied upon.

"There is one which is suresby, as they say, to serve, if anything will serve."—Bradford in Goodrich & Porter.

sūre'-tŷ (s as sh), seurte, sure-tee, sure-tye, s. [O. Fr. seürte, seurtet; Fr. sureté, from Lat. securitatem, accus. of securitas, from securus=secure (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Security, safety.

"They were fayne to resorte to their shypes for theyr suertye."—Fabyan: Chronycle, ch. xlviii.

2. Certainty, indubitableness.

"Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs."—Genesis xv. 13.

3. Security against loss or damage; security for payment.

"And he shal han Coustance in mariage,

And certain gold, I n'ot what quantitee,

And hereto finden suffisant suretee."

Chaucer: C. T., 4,683.

4. That which makes sure, secure, firm, or certain; assurance; ground of stability or security.

"We our state

Hold, as you yours, while our obedience holds;

On other surety none." Milton: P. L., v. 538.

*5. Evidence, ratification, confirmation, guarantee.

"She called the saints to surety,

That she would never put it from her finger,

Unless she gave it to yourself."

Shakesp.: All's Well that Ends Well, v. 3.

6. In the same sense as II.

"I'll be his surety."—Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

7. One who takes the place of another; a substitute, a hostage.

"In him our Surety seemed to say,

'Behold, I bear your sins away,'"

Cowper: Olney Hymns, xix.

II. Law: One who is bound with and for another who is primarily liable, and who is called the principal; one who enters into a bond or recognizance to answer for the appearance of another in court, or for his payment of a debt, or for the performance of some act, and who, in case of the failure of the principal, is liable to pay the debt and damages; a bondsman, a bail.

¶ (1) Surety of good behavior: A recognizance or obligation to the commonwealth entered into by a person with one or more sureties before some competent judge of record, whereby the parties acknowledge themselves to be indebted to the commonwealth in a specified amount, with condition to be void if the defendant shall demean and behave himself well, either generally or specially, for the time therein limited. It includes surety for the peace and something more. A justice may bind over all night-walkers, such as keep suspicious company, or are reported to be pilferers or robbers, common drunkards, cheats, idle vagabonds, and other persons whose misbehavior may reasonably bring them within the general words of the statute as persons not of good fame. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 18.)

(2) Surety of the peace: The acknowledgment of a bond to the commonwealth, taken by a competent judge of record, for keeping the peace.

"Any justice of the peace may, ex-officio, bind all those to keep the peace who in his presence make any affray; or threaten to kill or beat another; or contend together with angry words, or are brought before him by the constable for a breach of the peace in his presence; and all such persons as, having been before bound to the peace, have broken it and forfeited their recognizances. Also, whenever any private man has just cause to fear that another will do him a corporal injury, or procure others so to do; he may demand surety of the peace against such person; and every justice of the peace is bound to grant it, if he who demands it will make oath that he is actually under fear of death or bodily harm. This is called swearing the peace against another; and if the party does not find such sureties as the justice in his discretion shall require, he may immediately be committed till he does, or until the expiration of a year; for persons committed to prison for not entering into recognizances or finding sureties to keep the peace can in no case be detained for more than twelve months. Such recognizance, when given, may be forfeited by any actual violence, or menace even, to the person of him who demanded it, if it be a special recognizance; or, if the recognizance be general, by any unlawful action whatsoever, that either is or tends to a breach of the peace."—Blackstone: Comment., book iv., ch. 18.

sūre'-tŷ (s as sh), v. t. [SURETY, subst.] To be surety or security for; to guarantee.

"We'll surety him."—Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iii. 1.

sūre'-tŷ-ship, sūre'-tī-ship (sū as shū), s. [Eng. surety; -ship.] The state or position of being surety; the obligation of a person to answer for the debt, fault, or nonperformance of another, and to make good any loss occasioned thereby.

"If here not clear'd, no suretyship can bail Condemn'd debtors from th' eternal jail."

Denham: Of Prudence, 157.

sūrf (1), s. [Etym. doubtful. According to Skeat, the more correct form is suffe (q. v.), for sough=a rush or rushing noise, from A. S. swōgan=to make a rushing noise.] [Swoon, SOUGH (2), s.] The swell of the sea which breaks upon the shore or upon sandbanks or rocks.

"The rising of the waves against the shore, is called by mariners the surf of the sea."—Goldsmith: Animated Nature, pt. i., ch. xvii.

surf-boat, s. A peculiarly constructed boat for landing or pushing off through the surf.

surf-boatman, s. One who manages a surf-boat.

"It is an erroneous notion that the experience of the sailor qualifies him for a surf-boatman."—Scribner's Magazine, Jan., 1880, p. 323.

surf-duck, s. [SURF-SCOTER.]

surf-scoter, s.

Ornith.: Œdemia perspicillata; a North American Duck, which has been obtained, a straggler, a good many times in Europe. Length about twenty-one inches; plumage black, with an oval patch of white on the top of the head and on the back of the neck; beak, legs, and toes orange-yellow. Called also Surf-duck.

sūrf (2), s. [SOUGH (1), s.]

Agric.: The bottom or conduit of a drain. (Prov.) sūr'-face, s. & a. [Fr., from sur=above, upon, and face (Lat. faciem)=face; cf. Lat. superficies, from super=above, and facies=a face. Surface and superficies are therefore doublets.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The upper face of anything; the exterior part of anything that has length and breadth; one of the limits that terminate a solid; the superficies, the outside; as, the surface of a cylinder, the surface of the sea, &c. Popularly surface is used to designate not only the superficies, or exterior part of bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.

-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

anything, but also a certain thickness or depth below the outside; as, to pare off the surface of a field; the surface of the earth, &c.

"His passions like th' wat'ry stores that sleep Beneath the smiling surface of the deep."
Cowper: Hope, 184.

(2) In the same sense as II. 2.

2. Fig.: Outward or external appearance; that which appears or is presented on a slight or superficial view, without examination; as, On the surface of it the proposition appears fair.

II. Technically:

1. Fort.: That part of the side which is terminated by the flank prolonged, and the angle of the nearest bastion.

2. Geom.: That which has length and breadth only, and so distinguished from a line which has length only, and a solid which has length, breadth, and thickness. Surfaces are distinguished algebraically by the nature and order of their equations; thus a plane surface is a surface of the first order; a curved surface is a surface of the second order. Surfaces are also distinguished by their mode of generation.

3. Physics: When geometrical reasoning is applied to the propositions of physics, the word surface is used in the ordinary geometric sense, that is, length and breadth without thickness [2], but when the abstract is modified into the concrete, the surface in physics has, in an indefinitely small amount or thickness, depth, a geometrical surface existing only as a mental conception.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the surface; situated or being on the surface; external; hence, figuratively, superficial, specious, insincere; as, mere surface loyalty.

¶ For the difference between surface and superficies see SUPERFICIES.

¶ (1) Curved surface: A surface which may be cut by a plane through any given point, so that the line of common section of the plane and surface may be a curve, as the surface of a sphere, cylinder, or cone.

(2) Developable surface: A surface that can be unwrapped in a plane without any doubling of parts over one another, or separation, as the surface of the cylinder and cone.

(3) Plane surface: [PLANE, s., A. II. 2.]

(4) Ruled surface: A surface described by the motion of a straight line, which neither remains parallel to a given line, nor always passes through a given point, as a conoidal surface.

(5) Tubular surface: A surface generated by a circle of a given radius, which moves with its center on a given curve, and its plane at right angles to the tangent of that curve.

(6) Undevelopable surface: A surface that cannot be developed in the plane.

surface-chuck, s.

Lathe: A face-plate chuck to which a flat object is dogged for turning.

surface-condenser, s.

1. Steam-eng.: A chamber or congeries of pipes in which steam from the cylinder is condensed.

2. A steam-heated apparatus, consisting of pipes or chambers over which a solution is conducted in order that its watery particles may be driven off.

surface-gauge, s. An implement for testing the accuracy of plane surfaces.

surface-grub, s.

Entom.: The grub or caterpillar of Triphæna pronuba. [TRIPHÆNA, UNDERWING.]

surface-joint, s. A joint uniting the ends or edges of metallic sheets or plates.

surface-man, s.

Rail. Eng.: A person whose duty it is to keep the permanent way in order.

surface-plane, s.

Wood-working: A form of planing-machine for trueing and smoothing the surface of an object run beneath the rotary cutter on the bed of the planer.

surface-printing, s. Printing from an inked surface in contradistinction to the plate-printing process, in which the lines are filled with ink, the surface cleaned, and the ink absorbed from the lines by pressure upon the plate. Books, newspapers, woodcuts, and lithographs are all surface printed.

surface-roller, s.

Calico-printing: The engraved cylinder used in calico-printing.

surface-twist, s.

Bot.: (1) Polygonum aviculare; (2) Agrostis stolonifera angustifolia. (Britten & Holland.)

surface-water, s. Water which collects on the surface of the ground; it is usually run off into sewers or drains.

surface-working, s.

Mining: The operation of digging for gold or other minerals on the top soil.

surf'-face, v. t. [SURFACE, s.]

1. To put a surface on; to give a surface to; espec., to give a fine surface to; to make smooth or polished.

2. To work the surface of, as ground, in searching for gold, &c.

3. To bring to or place on the surface; to raise to the surface.

"To surface the stuff now accumulated."—Money Market Review, Aug. 29, 1885.

surf'-faç-ër, s. [Eng. surf(e), v.; -er.]

1. A machine for planing and giving a surface to wood.

2. One who digs for gold, &c., in the surface soil.

surf*e, sur-fell*, sur-fle*, sur-fyll*, v. trans. [Prob. corrupted from sulphur.] To wash, as the face, with a cosmetic, supposed to have been prepared from sulphur.

"She shall no oftener powder her hair, surfell her cheeks, cleanse her teeth, or conform the hairs of her eye-brows, &c."—Ford: Love's Sacrifice, ii. 1.

surf'-feit, *sur-fet, *sur-feyte, v. t. & i. [SURFEIT, s.]

A. Transitive:

I. Lit.: To feed to excess so as to overload and oppress the stomach, and derange the functions of the system; to overfeed so as to produce sickness or nausea.

II. Figuratively:

*1. To overburden; to weigh down.

"No more would watch, when sleepe so surfeited
Their leaden ey-lids."

Chapman: Homer's Odyssey, ii.

2. To fill to satiety or disgust; to cloy.

"To surfeit and injure ourselves by excessive indulgence."—Knox: Sermons, vol. vi., ser. 20.

*B. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To be fed till the system is oppressed, and sickness or nausea results.

"Who before pampered himself with all sorts of delicacies even to surfeiting."—Sharp: Sermons, vol. vi., ser. 3.

2. Fig.: To feel uneasy in consequence of excess.

"Love surfeits not, lust like a glutton dies."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 803.

surf'-feit, *sur-fet, *sor-fait, s. [O. Fr. sorfaire = excess, orig. pa. par. of sorfaire, surfaire = to overprize, to make of excessive value; O. Fr. sor; Fr. sur = above, and fait, pa. par. of faire (Lat. facio) = to do, to make, to deem.]

I. Literally:

1. Excess in eating and drinking; an excessive or gluttonous meal by which the stomach is overloaded, and the digestion deranged.

"He was half-killed with a surfeit of Shene pippins."—Thackeray: English Humorists, Swift.

2. Fullness and oppression of the system, arising from excessive or gluttonous eating or drinking.

"So prodigious in quantity, as would at another time have produced a fever or surfeit."—Anson: Voyages, bk. ii., ch. ii.

II. Fig.: Disgust caused by satiety; satiety, nausea.

"Zelmane thought it not good for his stomach to receive a surfeit of too much favor."—Sidney: Arcadia, bk. iii.

surfeit-swelled, a.* Swelled out with gluttony or other over-indulgence. (Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., v. 5.)

surfeit-water, s.* Water for the cure of surfeits.

"A little cold-distilled poppy-water, which is the true surfeit-water, with ease and abstinence, often ends distempers in the beginning."—Locke.

surf'-feit-ër, s. [Eng. surfeit, v.; -er.] A glutton, a reveler, a rioter.

"I did not think

This am'rous surfeiter would have donn'd his helm."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 1.

surf'-feit-ing, subst. [SURFEIT, v.] The same as SURFEIT, s. (q. v.)

surf'-flew* (ew as ô), s. [Pref. sur- (2), and flue.] (See extract.)
